A Grateful Missionary

In a letter just received, Miss A. Adelaide Brown, of Kodoli, Kolhapur, writes: "You would be surprised to see how much has been done in a year by the generosity of your subscribers. Every cent has been spent where it would do the most good. No money has been wasted. Boys are learning trades. No words can tell you how we thank you. Only in eternity will you know the results of your effort to find help for these little ones. There are here 514, once heathen, who, through the help sent in response to your appeals, may yet meet in heaven. Your readers have put their money in the bank of the Almighty, which can never fail."

The Holiest Day of the Jewish Year

THESE are the days of preparation among the Hebrew race all over the world, for the approaching "Day of Atonement," (Yom Kippur), the most sacred of all the days on the Jewish calendar. From sunset on the 22d day of September (the tenth day of Tishri, according to the Hebrew reckoning), until sunset of the 23d, this holy day is faithfully observed by the sons and daughters of Abraham. There is, however, a wide difference in the manner of the observance. Among the orthodox, and more especially among the multitude of Jewish poor, such as may be found on the East Side of New York, there is a remarkable strictness in the manner of keeping the ancient holy days and festivals, and few, or none, of the more honored customs are omitted. On the other hand, the "reform" element (which includes the younger generation, whose contact with the world has greatly loosened the bonds of their orthodoxy), have discarded many of those details to which the Jew for ages has clung with undiminished veneration and attachment. Thus it happens that even in the same city, the observance of the Atonement Day is widely different; that which prevails among the poor but orthodox masses of the East Side having many features that are omitted in the homes of the "reformed" Jew.

Several days before the ushering in of Yom Kippur, the East Side streets are crowded with wags and push-carts, filled with live chickens, which are being sold for Capuras. Even the poorest Jew buys one Capura for each member of his family, for he must have a sacrifice to offer. Twenty-four hours before Yom Kippur begins, the ceremony of the Capuras takes place. Each male member of the family takes a male fowl, and each female a hen. The fowl is held above the person's head, and swung around three times, while the words are chanted: "Ze Chaliposi, Ze Timirosi, Ze Caporosi." This is followed by a short prayer. The meaning of the chant is substantially that the sins of the person performing the ceremony have been transferred to the fowl, which is then sacrificed, being slaughtered by the Shofet. The value of the chickens is given to the poor. The following day (Erev Yom Kippur, the morning of Yom Kippur) is one of the busiest of the year to the Jewish housewife. Rising at sun-up, she begins her labors for the day. Not only must she have her day's work done before sunset, but she must cook food for the following night, when the fast is to be broken. At sunset, the members of the family assemble at the home of the eldest to receive the eternal blessing. The old father, raising his hand, blesses his children and grandchildren one by one. Then begins the long fast, and all the members of the household go to the Schuhl or synagogue. All enter except the old father, who, if strictly orthodox, must receive Malkis (being beaten with stripes for his sins). The aged man kneels, his forehead touching the floor, and four blows are administered with a leathern strap. This beating is one of five punishments for sins, the other four (which are now mere tradition) being Skilla (stoning to death); Sree (pouring molten lead down the throat); Heil (beating to death with clubs), and Cher (strangling to death). After receiving the alkis the venerable parent enters the synagogue. At the door he removes his shoes, puts on the Kittel, or shroud (in which he is to be buried), the Tallus, or holy shawl, and with the Machzer (prayer book) in hand, he begins his fast with prayers for forgiveness. When the congregation are all present the Seifer Taura, or scrolls are removed from the ark and passed among them to be kissed.

"TEKUO"—THE "SHOFER" SOUNDED BEFORE THE PEOPLE

Then begins Kol Nidrei, the most beautiful and impressive of all the ceremonies of this Holy Day. The congregation stand. The cantor, with three rabbis and the choir in front, face Mizrach (the East), and for a moment all are silent. The cantor, choir and congregation, with their Kittels (shrouds), Taleisum (shawls) and white skull-caps make a picturesque and awe-inspiring group. Slowly and clearly the voice of the cantor rings out: "Kol Nidrei," followed by the rest of the song or chant. This is repeated three times by the cantor and choir. The formula chanted has been instituted to provide against the consequences of vows rashly made during the year, and which the Jew may neglect or find impossible to perform, or from which he may not have been absolved according to the established regulations. Three rabbis are always at the reading desk at the time this formula is sung by the cantor.

At the closing of Kol Nidrei most of the congregation go to their homes, the more religious remaining all night and all of the following day. Twenty-four hours in the synagogue; without food, drink or sleep! In certain Eastern countries some of the orthodox among the Hebrews remain standing during the twenty-four hours of this observance.

The following day, all who have been at home return, and continue praying until the setting of the sun. During this day the most impressive prayer is that beginning with the word Ushamnu—"We have sinned." As each word is pronounced every member present beats the left breast with the right hand. All fast who are physically able—men, women and children alike.

Even those who adhere but little to the ancient faith observe the Day of Atonement, and keep it holy by abstaining from all labor and from food and drink.

When the day closes, joy can be seen expressed in every face; for all faithfully believe that God has forgiven them their sins. The Shofer, or ram's horn, is then blown—one sharp, clear note—and the following words repeated: "Lashono Habo Byrushalaim"—The coming year we shall be in Jerusalem.

During the Atonement, the East Side, usually anything but attractive, is absolutely clean. Its people—comprising Hebrews from the Orient, Russia, Poland, Austria, Germany, and almost every land under the sun—are there, arrayed in their best, and the display of finery is frequently strikingly picturesque. There are not enough regular Schuhls or synagogues to contain the thousands who observe the holy day, so shops, lofts, assembly halls, and even rooms in private dwellings are utilized. Of these improvised places of assembly there are over one thousand in the East Side alone. At the close of the long fast, the multitude seek their homes, where a bountiful table is spread, and a festival repast of good things is enjoyed by all. It is a happy, joyous ending to the great religious event of the Jewish year.

An Aggressive Christian Work

How the Y. M. C. A. of Buffalo, N. Y., is Availing Its-of the Opportunities of the Pan-American Exposition

BY REV. W. J. PECK

THIS has been a busy season for the Young Men's Christian Association of Buffalo, N. Y. The managers realized that the thousands of visitors who would come to the Exposition, would furnish an opportunity not often to be met with for Christian work. The vineyard of the Christian Worker is the sphere near to his hand, and the measure of the opportunity is the measure of the effort to be put forth. Happily, the Y. M. C. A. had in its General Secretary, Mr. A. H. Whitford, an executive officer of rare skill and abundant energy.

Among the plans adopted for getting in contact with visitors, was the opening of a Bureau of Reception and Information, which has been heartily appreciated and extensively used. No less than twelve thousand accommodations for guests had been arranged by this Bureau by the beginning of August, and the number has increased largely since that time. The Bureau has been very useful in other ways to strangers in the city. Special meetings have been held at the Central Y. M. C. A. Building, and in the Tent "Evangelist," which was set up on the corner of Lincoln Parkway and Soldiers' Plot, near the official entrance to the Exposition grounds. The audiences in the tent have been very large and the attention paid to the speakers has been very notable. These services have been enlivened by the singing of the Hardy Sisters, whose melodious voices proved a great attraction and delight.

The Buffalo Association has a long and honorable history. It was the third Association organized on this continent. Montreal and Boston alone ante-date it. The building still stands in which thirty-eight earnest men met to arrange the details of the institution. Recent statistics show, that in proportion to population it is now doing the largest work of any city Association. It has 4,634 names enrolled in its various departments. An interesting feature is its work among boys, of whom there were 582 last year in its Bible Study Classes. During the annual camping last autumn, thirteen of these made profession of faith in Christ. The Railroad Department is also carrying on a flourishing work, and its library is highly appreciated by the members.

Although Buffalo's Central Building is an imposing edifice, it has proved this year inadequate for its extensive work. Plans have already been made for a more commodious structure. It is proposed to erect a fire-proof steel edifice, ten stories high, with an annex on each side, one for the boys' work and the other for a night school. It will contain a gymnasium, with an area of five thousand square feet, and armories capable of accommodating one hundred men. These, in addition to the rooms for the association work proper. Already $175,000 has been pledged towards the cost of building, and the good reason for believing that fully as large a sum will be raised in addition. Land has been purchased, and it is hoped that before the close of the year the building will be completed.

Mr. A. H. Whitford, the General Secretary, becoming a veteran in Association work. He is a native of Massachusetts. Though only thirty-six years of age he has been eighteen years in harness as secretary in various cities. His first sphere was Middleburg, Mass. Thence he was called to Cambridge, Mass. Afterwards he labored successfully for years at Rochester, N. Y., thoroughly reorganizing the Association there. His work at Buffalo promises to eclipse all previous records.

Mr. Whitford dates his conversion from his attendance on some revival services held by Evangelist S. M. Sayford. The fact has had a deep influence on him, not only in grateful feeling toward that evangelist, but in confidence in evangelistic methods generally. During his residence in Rochester, N. Y., he organized special services, in which hundreds of young men pledged themselves to Christ.

THE GOSPEL IN THE KENTUCKY MOUNTAINS

IT is now little more than one year ago since two mission teachers (of the Society of Soul Winners) opened a Bible School on the Canoe, a branch of the Middle Fork of the Upper Kentucky River. These were Mrs. Kate Robards, of Wilmore, Ky., and Mrs. Mattie Stewart, of Florida. They were afterwards assisted by Miss Mary Scrogin, of Versailles, Ky. During the summer, Dr. E. O. Guerrant, President of the Society, visited that section of the mountains, and preached a week under a large tent. Some fifty persons confessed Christ, and were baptized. Rev. Dr. Miles Saunders, and Mr. Elias Moore rendered valuable assistance at these meetings.

During the winter the Mission School suspended for want of a place to teach in. There was no church in the country, and no schoolhouse which could be warmed. When in New York City last winter, Dr. Guerrant received a promise from Rev. Harvey S. Murdoch's Sabbath School, to help build a church on the Canoe. That promise was faithfully kept, and the self-denying children of that church sent $250 to help put up the building. The work was begun in April, and finished the 27th of July. Rev. Mr. Murdoch came on from New York to the dedication.

After a few days' rest at Wilmore, Ky., the dedicating party started to the Canoe. One hundred miles by rail brought them to Elkatawa, where they were met by Mr. Addison Talbot, of Versailles, another Soul-Winner employed on the Canoe. A horse, a mule, and a road wagon conveyed them eleven miles over the mountains to Canoe. It was very hot and dry, and all signs of rain seemed to fail. A large, live snake was hung by its tail, over the road, by some superstitious person, in the vain effort to make it rain. Dr. Guerrant killed the snake and took the chances.

Evening brought them to the Canoe. A beautiful church, 24 by 40 feet, was standing where the tent had stood a year ago—the first church in that land, and the only one many there had ever seen. Comfortable pews, a neat pulpit, beautiful flowers, and a crowd of happy children furnished it. They had been singing since two o'clock, waiting for the coming of the party.

Credit for this building belongs largely to Mr. Addison Talbot, and to Miss Alida Beyer, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who gave up her position as city missionary and came to Canoe, in May, to teach the children of the mountains. They worked with their own hands, assisting the carpenters to finish the church for the dedication.

Sunday, the 28th of July, the crowds, mostly on foot, gathered by eight o'clock, and by nine A. M. the building was crowded. Scores of children were glad to find seats on the pulpit platform. By invitation, Rev. Mr. Murdoch preached the dedication sermon. After the sermon, some fifty persons came forward to profess their faith in Christ, many for the first time.

This little mountain church seats 250 people, and was built at a cost not exceeding $350. The Soul-Winners' Society is engaged in building three other churches in these mountains. At Turner's Creek they, too, have begun to build a log church, having no help, and the people being too poor to buy even rough plank. Dr. Saunders promises to have it done by September. At Crockettville, Miss Mary McCorkle Wilson is teaching a mission school in the church built there last summer. At Lick Branch, a wild, poor country, Miss Margaret Sinclair, is teaching a mission of over 60 children and parents. There is no church in that part of the country, but Mr. Adams, a native teacher, is employed by the Soul-Winners' Society to hold services in the little school there. The Society has now six promising missions in the field, taught by Mrs. Saunders, Mrs. Gordon, Misses Beyer, Sinclair and Pollei, aided by Dr. Saunders and Mr.

Any reader of this journal, who may be interested in this spiritual work in these lonely mountain districts, should address Rev. E. O. Preaching on a Historic Site

A UNIQUE EVANGELISTIC EFFORT IN PHILADELPHIA

DR. L. W. MUNHALL HOLDING NOONDAY SERVICES AT INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA

H. Converse is Chairman and Rev. James B. Ely Secretary. The good done in these tents suggested the idea of open-air services. Application was made to Mayor Ashbridge for permission to hold a service in City Hall Square, and it was promptly and courteously granted. So successful were these meetings that it was decided to duplicate them at another centre. The steps of historic Independence Hall presented an ideal site. Permission being granted, the meetings were begun. They were conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall, the eminent evangelist, and were blessed from the outset. Dr. Munhall's manly, vigorous preaching was thoroughly appreciated. He was obliged to leave the meetings in other hands while the movement was at its best, in order to preach at the Winona Bible Conference, but the service has been continued, day by day, during his absence, and has been owned of God to the salvation of many souls.

WE gladly welcomed, about a month ago, the appearance here of the first itinerant musicians of the season. They were a party of three men in Arab costume, with some of the very instruments we wanted to see and hear—the harp, viol and pipe of the Bible. Dr. Hofe immediately sent for a photographer. Meanwhile we borrowed a tabret, and persuaded our third daughter, Canada, to assume the role of Miriam (Ex. 15: 20). But she "did not like to be stared at" by the crowd that congregated to see the picture taken, and consequently refused "to be so pleasant;" nevertheless, we were glad to get the picture for the sake of the instruments, in spite of the unprepossessing look of the men. A few days later, another party of minstrels appeared at our gate; these have been succeeded by others, who choose the summer for itinerant in the mountains. We never see them during the winter, for in the inclement season they keep to the plains and warmer sections.

We are accustomed to picture David's harp as the graceful instrument of the present day; and when we enter the Orient, and discover that this was not at all what David played upon, we are, to say the least, disappointed. When we read that the word translated "harp" in the Bible is rendered "ood" in the Arabic, or "kitar" in the more classical version, and finally resolves into the English "guar," we see that we must surrender preconceived ideas and imagine David playing upon an "instrument made of sounding wood furnished with strings." Joshua says ten, and this agrees with my own observation. There are three or four harps in this village, and the young men like to take them to the fountains, near which they sit in the cool of the evening. Barnes (Notes on Old Testament), in speaking of the viol, says: "It is not very easy to form a correct idea of this instrument." I should say so, too. Viol is translated "Babbab" (Old Version), in Arabic, and I was more than delighted to find that an instrument bearing that name is well known here; is a favorite among the Arabs. The frame consists of four pieces of wood, two forming the sides and two can be played on with both hands like a drum or tambourine, while the upper is provided with a single string, composed of about twenty horse-hairs, and played upon with a bow. The tabret is an instrument familiar to the West, and needs little description: it is nothing less than the tambourine. When, now, in fancy, we see the women coming out of all the cities of pipes and harps" (I. Sam. 10: 5), we understand what instruments they used. I remarked lately to Dr. S., a native physician, that I had never seen an appreciative comment on Arabic music by Europeans, and that, personally, I was forced to concur in their sentiments—the medleys I had heard sounded barbaric. He asked "Did you ever hear a skilled player?" I acknowledged I had not. "Ah!" said he, "you may well not care for Arabic music, an 'ood' in the hands of an unskilled musician is like a lancet in the hands of a barbarian." "No wonder, then," I said, "that Saul, with all his love for music, sought out a 'cunning player upon the harp'."

"Pipe" (Isa. 5: 12), is translated "Ni" in Arabic. It is a single reed, about a foot and a half in length, furnished with holes in the lower part; it is the rudimentary "organ," which invention may safely be credited to Jubal. But let no one think that the wonderful instrument we hear in our cathedrals has anything in common with its ancient prototype, save the single pipe which forms the latter, and from which the former, in all its grandeur and complexity, is a development. The musical instruments of the East in use at the present day are those that have been used for centuries; the names, even, have not changed.

For ourselves, although we do not like native music, we are always interested to see the descendants of those musicians who "hanged their harps upon the willow trees" (Ps. 137: 2), and of those minstrels who "played before kings" (II. Kings 3: 15), and of such as Jesus beheld when he came to the ruler's house in Capernaum, where he "saw the minstrels and the people making a noise."

Hot Weather Religion.

WHAT excitement among the thermometers we have had lately! Do you feel as religious as in cool weather? It takes more grace to be an earnest and useful Christian in summer than in any other season. The very destitute, through lack of fuel and thick clothing, may find the winter the trying season; but those comfortably circumstanced find summer the Thermopylae that tests their Christian courage and endurance.

The spring is suggestive of God and heaven and the resurrection day. That eye must be blind that does not see God's footsteps in the new grass, and hear his voice in the call of the swallow at the eaves. In the white blossoms of the orchards we find suggestions of those whose robes have been made white in the blood of the Lamb. A May morning is a door opening into heaven. So, autumn mothers a great many moral and religious suggestions. The season of corn-husking, and the gorgeous woods that are becoming the catafalque of the dead year, remind the dullest of his own fading and departure.

But summer fatigues and weakens, and no man keeps his soul in as desirable a frame unless by positive resolution and special implorations. Pulpit and pew often get stupid together, and ardent devotion is adjourned until September.

But who can afford to lose two months out of each year, when the years are so short and so few?

He who stops religious growth in July and August will require the next six months to get over it. Nay, he never recovers. At the season when the fields are most full of leafage and life, let us not be lethargic and stupid.

Let us remember that iniquity does not cease in summer time. She never takes a vacation. The devil never leaves town. The child of want, living up that dark alley, has not so much fresh air nor sees as many flowers as in winter time. In cold weather the frost blossoms on her window-pane, and the snow falls in wreaths in the alley. God pity the wretchedness that pants and sweats, and festers and dies on the hot pavements in the cellars of the town. Let us remember that our exit from this world will more probably be in summer than in any other season, and we cannot afford to die at a time when we are least alert and worshipful. At mid-summer the average of departures is larger than in cool weather. The sunstrokes, the dysenteries, the fevers, the choleras have affinity for July and August and early September. On the edge of the summer, Death stands whetting his scythe for a great harvest. We are most careful to have our doors locked, and our windows fastened, and our burglar-alarm set at times when thieves are most busy, and at a season of the year when diseases are most active in their burglaries of life we need to be ready.

Our charge, therefore, is make no adjournment of your religion till the cool weather. Whether you stay in town, or seek the farm-house or the seashore, or the mountains, be faithful in prayer, in Bible reading, and in attendance upon Christian ordinances. He who throws away two months of life, wastes that for which many a dying man would have been willing to give all his possessions when he found that the harvest was past and the summer was ended.

See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil. Eph. 5: 15.

Titles for Sale

WITHIN the past few days many people have been shocked by the fact that the title of Doctor of Divinity was purchased. It was no shock to us, for the reason that titles in this country are often bestowed unworthily. We have known cases where a contribution to a college or theological seminary has, on the following commencement, won an honorary degree. The bestowment of a title is no sign of especial talent or usefulness. We all know men, with less than the ordinary modicum of brain, who have been adorned by literary institutions. The only use for the word "Doctor" as a prefix, is that it makes a convenient handle to one's name, so that if you have a difficulty in recalling the name, you can use the complimentary title. The showers of M.A., and D.D., and LL.D., every summer at college commencements, have made such recognition of no importance. Those who have seen behind the curtain of some learned institutions, are not surprised that honors are for sale. The fact that, in the cases now before the world, the titles were bestowed by a bogus institution, does not hinder us from learning the worthlessness of many literary and ecclesiastical epaulets, or from reprehending some of the modes by which so-called honors are gained.

Neither be ye called masters: for one is your master, even Christ. Matt. 23: 10.

The Chautauquas

THE great summer meetings, sometimes called Assemblies and sometimes called Chautauquas, have ended. In July and early August they were in full swing, and never have they done better work than this summer. Soon after they began, more than a quarter of a century ago, we were asked, "What is a Chautauqua?" We answered, "Take a cauldron and put into it a large number of John Wesley's sermons, then put into the same cauldron a good many Presbyterian Westminster catechisms, then add some Episcopalian prayer-books, then put into the cauldron enough water from a baptistry to moisten it all through, then stir it up well, and that is a Chautauqua, and one drop of that potion would kill a bigot dead as a door nail." In other words, a Chautauqua is a mingling of religion and philosophy, and art and amusement, and healthful exercise. There are, I am told, over three hundred of these summer meetings. That may be an over-estimate, but there are over one hundred, as we know by personal observation. They did a mighty work in the nineteenth century, and will do a mightier work in the twentieth. The farming populations of America appreciate them, for the people of the country districts have but little opportunity of getting entertainment, and through these summer meetings they get regalement and help. The inhabitants of our great cities also find in such meetings a refreshment and a healthfulness which they can gain no where else. The name of Bishop Vincent, who founded the first Chautauqua, will be one of the few names which history will not let die.

All the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them. Neh. 8: 12.

As You See It

THE world is very much what we make it. Show me the color of a man's spectacles, and I will tell you what kind of a world it is: blue spectacles, a blue world; yellow spectacles, a jaundiced world; transparent spectacles, the same grand and glorious world that God made it. My friend, through indigestion, can see nothing bright about this world. Desiring to cheer him up one winter's day, I looked out of the window and said, "That snow is beautiful!" He answered, "It will turn to slush and sleet." I said, "The human body is a fine piece of mechanism." He answered, "Warts, croup, marasmus, corns, bunions, gout, indigestion." I hoisted the window and caught one of the flying snow-flakes, and put it under a microscope, and said, "I see God walking in this palace. The jewels of heaven are in these vases. I see the coursers of celestial dominion pawing these crystal pavements." He threw up his coat collar and said, "I am in a perfect chill; please to put down that window." I grew vehement and said, "You must have noticed that this is a splendid world. The looms of heaven must have been at work on the wing of a kingfisher. What morning was it that a warble slipped heaven and this oriole plucked it. What grotesque rock of the mountain hath set the streams into roystering laughter? What harp of heaven gives the pitch to the music of the south wind? There is enough wisdom to confound the earth and the heavens in the structure of one cricket. Even the weeds of the field are dressed like the daughters of God, and men may sneer at their commonness, but have no capacity to fathom or climb or compass the infinity of beauty in a dandelion, or in the blossom of a potato top. At the foot of this tube-rose angelic equipage must halt, and its cohorts climbing the winding stair of leaf, look off upon the kingdoms of floral wonder and the glory of them. On a summer night I have seen the stars of heaven and the dews of the earth married, the grass-blades holding up their fingers for the setting wedding signet, while voices from above said, 'this ring I thee endow with all my light and love and splendor celestial.' At sunset I have seen the flaming chariots of God drive down into Lake Winnebago, the panting nostrils stirring the water into sprays like dust tossed from the glittering wheels." He responded, "Oh, pshaw! I never saw or heard anything like that which you have seen and heard." So that halting him a bottle of Hoffland's dyspeptic bitters I rided from his depressing presence.

We may not all of us have the means to graduate at Harvard, or Yale, or Oxford, but there is a college at which all of us graduate—the college of hard knocks. Misfortune, fatigue, exposure and disaster are the professors; kicks, cuffs and blows are the curriculum. The day we leave the world is our graduation. Some sit down and cry. Some turn their face to the wall and pout. Others stand up and conquer. So some general in time of war said to his king, "Your majesty might as well surrender, for the enemy has taken castle one and castle two, and castle three!" Then the king, sitting on his heart, replied, "There is one castle they have not taken, my castle courage!"

Happy the bee that even under leaden skies looks for blossoming buckwheat. Wise the fowl that, instead of standing in the snow with foot drawn up under wing, ceases not all day to pick. According to my calculation, in the six thousand years of the world's existence, there must have been about two million days of sunshine, allowing one hundred and ninety-five thousand days for storms. Of the myriads of blossoms in my peach-orchard, there was not one blossom that did not in some respects surpass Walter Scott's "Marmion" or William Cullen Bryant's "Thanatopsis." In weighing out one patch of cantaloupes I threw over the fence about five thousand Tennysons and Longfellowes. Nothing but Omnipotence could have made legs strong enough to hold up the great Thanksgiving table for a world. Every grasshopper has a solo, and every bow-flake a psalm, and every honeysuckle a censer, and every pond-lily is a gondola for eternal glories to sail in, and there are pyramids in the cones of the white pine, and the blaze of the sunset is where the riot of daylight flashes into the sea of the great Forever.

Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh. Eccles. 1: 10.

Censoriousness

IT would be well, if not only in looking at our own condition, but at other people, we sought out the sparkle instead of the gloom. With five hundred faults of our own we ought to have somebody else to at least one. When there is such excellent hunting on our own ground, let us not with rifle and greyhound pack spend all our time in scouring our neighbor's lowlands. I am afraid the imperfections of other people will kill us yet. Oh, what a clean city it would make if every one washed his own door-steps!

How hard in literature for one man to speak well of another. Voltaire hated Rousseau. Lamb could not endure Coleridge. Waller wars against Cowley. The hatred of Plato and Xenophon is as immortal as their works. Corneille held utter contempt for Racine. At Westminster Abbey, in the "Poet's Corner," Stephen Drayton the poet, and Goldie, who said he was a poet. And there rests Dryden, and not far off, poor Shadwell, who had pursued him with a fiend's fury. Pope, and John Dennis, his implacable enemy. So when in our time you see people defaming and pursuing each other, do not think a new evil has assaulted the earth. Jealousy and slander are as old as sin.

Murmur not brethren, one against another, that ye not be judged. James 4: 9.

Angry Letters

NEVER write them. It is never worth while. By the time they reach their destination your anger will have cooled; you may even regret your vehemence. An angry letter is a stab sent by Uncle Sam's poison-tipped and venomous. It is beneath a Christian and unworthy anybody else, and is only less excusable than that unspeakably base thing, the anonymous letter.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Discovery of Buddha's Grave

ABOUT one-tenth of the whole human race are deeply interested in a discovery recently made by Mr. W. C. Peppe, the manager of Birdpur, a district in India. He has an estate on the English side of the border, in which are several large mounds, evidently of very ancient construction. One of these he determined to open. Workmen were sent to excavate and proceeded to remove the large quantity of earth. Below the surface, a dome-like structure, eighty-five feet in diameter, was found. It was composed of peculiar bricks, sixteen inches long, two inches wide and three inches thick. An opening was made in the dome, and underneath was found a large slab of stone lying due north and south. The slab being lifted, a coffer was disclosed, inside of which were two vases, a water-pot and a box. One of the vases contained dust and fragments of bone. In the other receptacles were jewels, gold stars and beautiful ornaments. It was clearly the tomb of a most illustrious person, but the identity of the person was not fixed until Mr. Peppe noticed a few faint lines on one of the vases. These lines stated that it was "the deposit of those remains of the Exalted One which belonged to the Sakyas." It was known that when Buddha died, about the year 543 B. C., his body was cremated and the ashes were divided into eight portions of which one was confided to the Sakyas, the clan to which the great teacher belonged. This, then, was the tomb in which the Sakyas buried their portion of Buddha's ashes. How sacred in the eyes of Buddha's relics are, may be imagined. Their veneration for their master is intense and comparatively few of them have realized that the fair glimmering of light that Buddha had, has been surpassed by the glory of the Sun of Righteousness.

It was a burning and a shining light and ye were willing for a season to be in his light, but I have greater lights (John 5: 35).

A Fatal Experiment

An investigation now being made in Cuba by a Medical Board has come to an abrupt termination. It had caused the death of one victim, and the critical illness of another before it was discontinued. It appears that Dr. Caidas, a Brazilian bacteriologist, and the advocate of a new system of treating yellow fever is now residing in Havana. At his request, a board of American and Cuban physicians has been appointed by the military governor, to examine and report on the efficacy of the new system. Dr. Caidas had a number of mosquitoes preserved to prove that part of his theory. Two Spaniards, who were anxious to become immunized, permitted the mosquitoes to bite them. One of them soon died and the other is in a critical condition. In former experiments, persons inoculated with the vaccine prepared by Dr. Caidas had a very light form of the disease, but in these two instances the disease became malignant. Spiritual disaster has often come in the same way. Persons who have voluntarily entered into association with vice, that they might study it, or might see it, have fallen victims to its fascination, and have perished. It is a dangerous experiment, though it is difficult to make young people realize that they are liable to be hurt by trying it.

Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall (1. Cor. 10: 12).

How the Church was Lighted

On Sunday evening of last week, the evening service in a church at Stratford, Conn., was suddenly interrupted by the failure of the electric lights. The electricity was usually supplied by a sub-station at Bridgeport, but the storm of the previous evening had disarranged the wires and the lights went out before the service was half through. The congregation was about to leave the church, but the minister asked them to wait while some oil lamps could be found and trimmed. Among the congregation was a gentleman who had come to church on an automobile. He went up to the pulpit and told the clergyman that he thought the lamp on his vehicle was powerful enough to light the church. He went to the shed at the rear of the church and ran the automobile on to an improvised platform close to the window behind the pulpit and turned on the power. Instantly the interior of the church was well lighted and the service was finished by that light. At the conclusion, the owner of the automobile received the congratulations of his fellow-worshippers on having saved the service. As the light that was intended to enable him to travel in safety furnished the light for worship, it may be hoped that he has learned the converse of the fact: that the light that comes in worship may guide him safely on his way through life.

He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness but shall have the light of life (John 8: 12).

A Brother Recognized

A strange experience befell the captain of the American schooner, F. M. Slade, while the vessel was lading at Honolulu recently. He was ashore attending to the purchase of stores, when a sailor approached him and asked if he had room for an able seaman on his ship. The captain questioned him, and learned that he really knew his business, but was out of a berth in consequence of the vessel on which he had served, having been wrecked off the coast of Hawaii a few days before. As the man answered, the captain looked more intently at him and finally asked him his name. As the captain had suspected, it was the same as his own, and instantly his hand went out and caught the hand of the other in a strong grip. "I know you," he said, "you are southeastern extremity of the island. A sentinel watched the prisoners, but this man seemed so quiet and so intent on his work, that the sentinel's vigilance was relaxed. Suddenly he was missed, and as it was growing dusk it was not easy to search for him. His clothing was found among the coal and then it was suspected that he had jumped into the river. Later, it was learned from some men on a boat that this was true. The man had been seen swimming toward the Brooklyn shore, and the crew of a passing tug thinking he was in danger of drowning, had taken him on board. It seems that the man is an inveterate deserter. He has enlisted four times in different regiments, and each time after a few months' service has deserted. It is extraordinary that he does not allow a long time to elapse before he re-enlists. The authorities are not making very strenuous search for him, being sure that in a little while he will present himself at some recruiting station for enlistment. Unhappily, ministers and Christian workers have something to do with such characters, who desert from Christ's army, and they are the most hopeless of all. Christ, himself uttered a warning to them.

No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God (Luke 9: 62).

BRIEF NOTES

The topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for September 22 is "The Saloon's Power Doomed." Psalm 37: 1-10. The article we usually publish on the Topic is omitted this week, as the subject is fully covered by Dr. Craft's article on page 774, and Mrs. M. Baxter's article on page 779.

Evangelist Robert L. Layfield and wife have been holding successful revival meetings at Stewartville, Mo. Thence they went to Montgomery City, Mo., where arrangements have been made for Union meetings.

The Winona Lake Bible Conference has this year had a very large attendance. More than three thousand persons were at some of the meetings. At the request of ministers of many denominations, Dr. L. W. Munhall preached on "Future Punishment." After the sermon there was a conference of ministers, who discussed the subject and pledged themselves to a more vigorous preaching of the doctrine in future.

At the recent Salvation Army camp-meeting at Old Orchard, Me., Commander Booth-Tucker said that the total number of officers is 3,000; uniformed soldiers, 20,000. There are 200 social institutes, which nightly shelter 8,000 poor persons at an annual cost of $300,000. The army also maintains 44 industrial homes, which give constant employment to about 600. The total expense of maintaining all the departments of the organization in the United States is $1,250,000.

The Church of Scotland has been offered an African mission, along with an endowment and reserve fund amounting together to $185,000. It is the East African Scottish Mission, founded nine years ago by a mercantile company of Christian men, and endowed in memory of the late Sir William Mackinnon.

It is not generally known, says the Presbyterian, that the father of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is still alive, and at the age of ninety-one was able to assist at the laying of the corner-stone of a new Baptist church last month. The Rev. John Spurgeon was, and continues to be, a Congregationalist, although both his sons, Charles and James, became Baptists.

More than 600 people attended the funeral of Mackay, the pioneer missionary of Formosa, and of these more than 200 were non-Christians who respected him. All the Europeans in north Formosa were present, including diplomatic agents. The mourning and lamentation of the native converts, and especially the pastors whom he had trained, are described as being extreme.

my brother. I thought there was something familiar in your face, and when I heard you speak, I felt sure." The brothers had not met for more than thirty years, since the elder in his boyhood ran away from home to go to sea. They spent the evening relating their respective adventures, and when the Slade was ready for sea they sailed away together. Perhaps if the sailor had not been wrecked he might have missed his brother and the cordial welcome he received. It is often so with those who come to Christ and find in him an Elder Brother from whom they will never separate. Some trial, or disaster, or sorrow leads them to him.

They have turned their back unto me and not their face, but in the time of their trouble they will say, Arise and save us (Jer. 2: 27).

—REV. A. C. GRIER.

WHO hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Literally, Who hath Oh? Who hath Alas? The Bible answers that it is the very tipplers whose motto is, "A short life but a happy one!" That even moderate drinking shortens life, insurance tables declare. If the drink does not bring even gladness, but rather "woe" and "sorrow," what do the drinkers get in return for their money? They pay out over a billion a year in the United States alone. When the nation was founded, scarcely anybody doubted that the drinker got a threefold return for his money, namely, food, medicine and joy. When the Declaration of Independence was written, few, if any, would have questioned that the right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," included the right to drink. Alcoholic beverages were considered "liquid bread," quite as much so as milk. Beer is still called "the poor man's bread," which seems like satire, in view of the fact that if the alleged "nutrition" of the barley sediment be admitted—and it is not—it would take to fill a flour barrel 313 gallons of beer—equivalent to buying flour at $250.40 per barrel. Few have even pretended, in the last half century, to drink for the sake of "nutrition." Professor Atwater has recently revived somewhat the generally abandoned theory that alcohol has a "food value." He has not claimed that it builds flesh or bone, but only that it produces heat energy, and is, therefore, a food, in the sense of fuel—a very dangerous fuel he has admitted. Kerosene, is a food for stoves, but not used by the wise. The last National Educational Convention, after full consideration, voted his theory "not proven," and so the tippler who is really after the "fuddle," will still be unable to pass on the public any claim that food is his object. Nor, can he longer pass the claim that in self-prescribed social beverages he is drinking to anybody's "health." All that science has left him is the claim that he gets the equivalent of his money in enjoyment. But the Bible and experience declare that this claim is as false as the others. It is "woe" and "sorrow" he gets for his investments in intoxicants. The temporary pleasure is but the froth on the cup, whose dregs are headache and heartache.

Whatever may be the case in other countries, or with older people in this country, there is little danger that our boys, with scientific temperance education in nearly all our schools, will adopt the drink habit for the sake of strength or health. They know too well that the rule of the athlete, training for some great test of strength, is to avoid intoxicants. The ancient error embodied in the name "strong drink," has thus been cancelled for them. If they drink, it will be because they think it is the way to "have a good time." We shall save the new generation, if we can prove to our boys—and girls, too—that "wine is a mocker," no less when it promises happiness, than when it promises health. This international lesson is an opportunity to prove this all round the world, at a time when the drink habit is declared by a commission of the British Parliament, and by missionaries, to be increasing almost everywhere. Every teacher should, by earnest preparation and prayer, resolve that every member of his class shall be fully persuaded by the facts he will marshal, that wine brings woe for both worlds. There is no other available world force that could do so much to turn back the rising tide of drink as the faithful use of the Quarterly Temperance Lessons.

Who hath contentions? First of all, the drinker has inward "contentions" in conscience, such as are described in Romans 7: 19 ff. He is forever warring against God and against his nobler self. No soul can rest that is not right. Nothing causes deeper "woe" and "sorrow" than such self-reproach. It is also the nature of alcohol to prompt the drinker to foolish quarrels with others. A fire without fuel would be hardly more unusual than a fight without drink. One large western city has recently been filled with sorrow and indignation, because a gang of boys, intoxicated in a Sunday saloon, picked a quarrel with the son of a leading citizen, whom they met on the street, which resulted in the death of the latter. Alcohol produces discord as inevitably as an organ produces music. Surely that which multiplies quarrels does not multiply joy.

Who hath babbings? The Revised Version translates, "Who hath complainings?" It is the drinker who has both in abundance. "Wine in, wit out." He puts "an enemy in his mouth to steal away his brains." The talk one hears in a saloon is indeed "babbling," such as the revelation of family secrets to strangers, with effusive expressions of love to boon-companions, and there is no little "complaining" about the lost job; the better condition of those who are not supporting saloon-keepers, the mothers and wives who object to the debauching of husbands and sons. Worse than these, and yet more common, is the horrible cursing and the filthy stories. "The whole head is sick," brain and tongue alike. Surely that is not the way to have "a good time."

Who hath wounds without cause? When Theodore Roosevelt, as Police Commissioner of New York, closed the Sunday saloons, he thereby thinned out the hospitals, a striking reminder of the fact that many wounds are due to drink, as well as many diseases. If we would close the saloons, we might, no doubt, turn half our hospitals into schools, of which many cities have too few, because taxes are so largely used up on the consequences of drink.

There is a crippled boy! What made him so? A drunken nurse dropped him in babyhood. There is a man with one leg gone! You will embarrass him if you ask him if he lost it fighting for his country, for it was amputated by a street car when he was too drunk to get out of the way. There is a wife and mother with one eye gone! It was gouged out in drunken fury by the man who had promised to love and cherish her. Bottles have made more wounds than bullets, and the scars of the former are not badges of honor but of shame. Surely these "wounds" mean "woe," not joy.

Who hath redness of eyes? In order to perfect physical enjoyment, the bodily organs must do their part so naturally that one hardly realizes he has an organism, as when a is in this long and worse than useless tarrying over the. Enough wasted opportunity to make the tippler both and wise, he uses to make himself both poor and foolish.

They that go to seek mixed wine. Even in the days of Solomon they began to "mix drinks" and adulterate it, and it is now almost impossible to be sure that any drink what it is called. In the Paris World's Fair, a lurid was thrown on these false pretenses, when the French refused to allow the exhibition of American and other labeled as French. However, let no one think the evil drink lie chiefly in the adulterations. Dr. Janeway, of New York, second to none as a medical authority, said to a writer: "The worst thing ever put in drink is alcohol."

Look not upon the wine when it is red (that is fermented), when it shows its bead on the cup, when it flows in beauty the flagon to the cup, and from the cup to the throat. He is an exhortation stronger than "Touch not." The old "Look not." We are to keep our very eyes, so far as possible, from even the sight of the lighter drinks; to keep out of sight of temptation. This is one great advantage of abstinence. Even if old toppers can find the drink in his places, it is not arranged attractive, in show windows before the gaze of boys and young men. And in "no license" places, law-abiding people are less likely to purchase toxicants on their tables.

At the last it biteth like a serpent (this is a general term), and stingeth like an adder (exceedingly venomous horned snake). In the report of the loss of the Maine read this country, the account was given of the dauntless courage with which the officers and sailors met the disaster. One, while the thunder of the explosion was sounding in his ears, appeared at the door of Captain Sigsbee's cabin, and touched his cap, said calmly: "Excuse me, sir, I have to report that the ship has blown up, and is sinking." He had faced an almost certain death in order to save the Captain's life. When the story was told, the head of the nation responded with a proud throb. Every American felt honored by the courage and coolness of his countryman, and rejoiced that by some happy chance he was among the few who were saved. His story is brief, and as it has been told in all the daily journals there can be no delicacy in reciting it here.

He was a manne orderly on the Maine, gallant, generous, friendly young fellow who had but one enemy—himself. He drank to excess. After the destruction of the Maine he came to this country, and was received with praise and affection as a hero. His friends gathered around him; he married, and soon had another position. He loved his work, his friends and his wife, but not work, nor friends, nor home could keep him away from the fatal habit. Not many years after that day when, a hero among heroes, he trod the deck of the sinking ship, he sat alone in a public park in New York, a miserable outcast, who for liquor had given up all that made life dear. Mad with want and despair, he kissed the picture of his child, and put an end to his life—and which God had fitted him to make happy and noble.

We tell this true story to American boys, as we would point out a serpent hidden in the path along which they must walk.

One winter day a gentleman, standing on the upper rapids of Michigan, saw an eagle light upon a frozen lamb, encrusted with a floating cake of ice, which was drifting every moment into the swifter rapids. Every now and then the eagle would pry up its head and look about as if to say, "I know I am drifting toward danger, but I can quit any time, and with my strong wings I can soar away to safety." As the ice neared the falls he rose and flapped his great wings, but in vain, for while he had feasted on the dead carcass, his feet had been frozen to its fleece, amid shrieks and vain struggles to break away he was carried over the falls to his doom, an awful picture of many a man, which has been fastened to covetousness or sensuality or petty self, that efforts to rise into a noble life hereafter have proved unavailing.

Thine heart shall utter perverse things. Earlier it was "babblings," now it is the ravings of delirium. Tongue as well as eyes go from bad to worse.

Thou shalt be as he that lieth on the top of a mast. So ancient fishing boats had on the top of the mast a small look made of netting, called a "crow's nest," from which fisherman could watch for distant schools of fish. With the boat tossing in the waves it was a place of danger, and man on lookout must be ever awake and alert, even to himself from falling. He would be foolish, indeed, who would lie down to sleep in such a rest. The Bible says position of the tippler is equally foolish and dangerous.

These warnings may all be concentrated in the historic picture of Belshazzar, the prosperous young King of Babylon, seventeen years of age, at his great banquet of which he had poured into the sacramental cups that had been brought by Nebuchadnezzar from the temple of Jerusalem. In the very midst of his feast God's awful hand wrote his doom, and that of his kingdom, in letters of fire on the walls of that banquet hall (Daniel 5). So the young man desecrates God's sacred vessel, his own body with wine, an invisible hand writes on the wall the warning of this lesson: "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging. Whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. Look not upon the wine."

healthy workman said: "I have no system." "Redness of eyes," which also implies dimness of vision, reminds us how every bodily function is disarranged by drink, as if one poured a muddy stream into a watch. The heart, whipped by alcohol into unnatural activity, throws the blood too rapidly into the little blood vessels of the eye and face, indeed, of the whole body, which for the moment increases surface heat, to be followed by unnatural cooling, as when coffee or tea has been poured into a saucer. The next effect is to stupefy the nerves, as when one takes ether, so that one does not feel either heat or cold, and so seems to be warmer in winter and cooler in summer, because less sensitive to his surroundings; but he is all the more in danger of freezing or sunstroke, because the watchman is stupefied. A doctor says: "If one can keep a good stomach and a good heart he can live forever." Alcohol disarranges both these great centres of physical life, and so all their outlets also.

They that tarry long at the wine. From the beginning it has been the tendency of drink to create the craving for more. When one has eaten abundantly, he wants no more till another meal-time, but every glass of intoxicants increases appetite. When there is added the attraction of social companions, in a pleasant room, with music and amusements, it is easy to "tarry long" in the "saloon," the loafing, treating, plotting resort which intensifies all the evils of drink, and is found in its worst form in the very countries that profess to be the best. In abject slavery to a foolish custom, the man who does not wish to drink, or would stop at one glass, drinks four or five rounds, in order that every member of the party may take his turn at treating. Besides the waste of money, what waste of precious time, what loss of work, there

Occupations for Women

VII—POULTRY RAISING

FROM shells to silver, is a pleasant path for the country-bred woman who knows how to raise fowls, and lives sufficiently near a railroad, or a good city market, to make the sale of fresh eggs a tender broilers remunerative. Only a woman used the farm and therefore to the manner born, should attempt the business of poultry raising, unless, indeed, she be more than a mere amateur, and serve an apprenticeship in learning how to care for brooding hens and their chicks, how to use an incubator for baby bipeds in feathers, and unless she discover all about foods and phosphates, coops and cleanliness, so that her toil will not prove disappointing. In England, titled ladies are managing poultry and dry farms, and numbers of young maids are employed upon them, learning, as in a regular school, how to do everything in the right way to the best advantage. In the mother country, matters horticultural and agricultural, receive a great deal of attention, and Queen Alexandra, stately personage that she is, has pride in her broods of fine poultry and in the products of her dairy.

A woman cannot go extensively into poultry raising without some capital. She must own or rent a piece of ground. She must have hen-houses, added in ventilation, warmth, and comfort, to the tenants. She must have at her fingers' ends a good deal of knowledge, and possess a stock of enthusiasm as well as of patience. If she can send her broilers to an early market, to the hotels, and the rich prize purchasers, who are ready to pay well for luxuries; if she can furnish unpaid eggs for the fastidious and the invalid the winter through, she will not fail to put money in her purse. No one woman who succeeds in this enterprise there are nineteen who fail, so that only the country-bred are safe in making the attempt. Much of the hard work may be delegated, but the requisite for success is continual supervision, and, added to that, there must be a genuine liking for the care of poultry-yard.

In the picture, the maiden is caring for the few hens and the lordly rooster which constitute her family of fowls. They know her call, and flock to the door-yard to be fed from her hand. Each of them has a name and an individuality known to the mistress, and she often asserts with emphasis, that she loves her pets too fondly ever to be willing to see them in the pot or the pie. That is one of the trials of her who raises domestic fowls, that, sooner or later, they must arrive at a tragic end. If one eats chickens, she prefers that somebody else should have watched them from the eggs her room untidy, and which she does not desire to carry away in her trunk. An ordinary peach-basket, covered with silkolene and finished with a large bow, makes an excellent waste-basket, or if silkolene is not to be had, crumpled tissue paper of any pretty color is an excellent substitute.

Every good housekeeper should also provide depositories for burnt matches, at a convenient spot in the guest-room.

A Needless Book

One of the correspondents who sends letters to the lady in the Veranda Chair asks for a reliable manual

"SEE THE CHICKENS ROUND THE GATE FOR THEIR MORNING PORTION WAIT."

In the Bonds of Habit

St. Walter Scott, writing in his journal, when near the end of his laborious life, speaks of having denied himself the pleasure of smoking for two months. "I will not be a slave to custom," are his words. The trouble with some forms of indulgence is, that they ensnare the one who practices them, and this by gradation so slow that the fetters are forged and riveted before he is aware. This is notoriously the case with the garette habit, and if any youth wishes to retain his liberty, he will never begin it.

A Bed of the Guest-Room

Of detail in the furnishing of the guest-chamber is often forgotten, and that is the waste-basket. The temporary occupant of the room looks about her in despair for a receptacle in which she may deposit bits of paper, corners of her hair, torn letters, and other odds and ends which she cannot leave around without making on courting. The lady at first felt puzzled, but on second reading, saw that the young man was in earnest. Now, courting is not like mathematics, to be taught by rule and rote out of a book. Its problems are worked out in one's own head and heart, and there is no sufficient guide, for on the courting road each man blazes his way for himself as he goes along. The old, old story of a man's love for a woman, and her's for him, is forever new in human experience, as new as this year's daisies and clover. You may read your success in the eyes of your sweetheart and in her blushes and dimples. A good rule to follow is the familiar one to be bold, yet not too bold. True love usually discovers the approach to the heart it seeks, however warily that heart keeps on guard. If books the swain must have, let him read the novels of the period: Henry Bourland; The Potter and the Clay; The Helmet of Navarre; and The Crisis. In these and other romances, he will find much love-making to copy.

Men-Servants

ONE wide field of service, that of housework, has commonly been considered the undisputed realm of women, except in cases of an establishment where a butler and a chef were necessary. A hotel cook has usually commanded as generous a salary as a college president, and few women have ever served in his kingly capacity. But now the suave and deft Oriental, Japanese, Chinese, or Syrian, and the soft-voiced negro, are stepping in to the aid of weary housewives, and it may be, that before long, there will be a protest from women, because men are employed in the positions of household labor formerly all their own.

For man or woman it is worth while to remember that success depends not on accident, but on character, and that character is the result of habit, mental and manual, practiced day by day.

BAGS

AS few of us have pockets,
We ladies carry bags,
In which we keep our folderols,
Our precious rags and tags.

Our purse, with change in silver,
Perhaps with gleaming gold,
Our watch, our cards, our letters
And all a bag can hold.

A bag is like the beanstalk
That famous Jack beheld;
It never seems inadequate
When into use compelled.

All sorts of things it gathers
Beneath its kindly grasp;
And gracefully it lends itself
To woman's clever clasp.

As few of us have pockets,
We're fain to carry bags,
In which to keep our folderols,
Our store of rags and tags.

Bible Verses Memorized

Once riveted in a juvenile memory, the beautiful Scripture texts are as nails fastened in a sure place. Little Edith has learned by heart the twenty-third psalm, the Beatitudes, and many a golden verse which she will never forget. Her mother teaches her a verse, by repeating it orally at bedtime, after her nightly prayers, and when one verse is known by heart, adds to it another. The exercise is a pleasure, not a burden, and insensibly the child is laying up for future use, wealth which she will never lose.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—MARGUERITE M. Go to bed at nine o'clock. Take plenty of exercise, and bathe all over every day. A girl cannot look dainty unless she does this. Your skin will soon be all right.

—AN INQUIRER. A new writer's work is accepted solely on its merits. Most papers pay something for contributions. To have your work returned, enclose, at the time of sending, stamps for return postage. Publishers usually attend to the matter of copyright.

—KNOW-NOTHING. If your friend does not personally open the door, take off your hat and say: "Is Miss Daisy at home?" If she is going anywhere with you, do not hurry her, but wait for her to give the signal for a start. If you take your buggy to her door, step out of it and ring her door-bell. When she appears, help her in before you take your own seat. As to the proper age for these attentions, it depends on the custom in your neighborhood. Where boys and girls have grown up together from childhood, they enjoy freedom of social intercourse from an early age. In large towns, a young lady does not go for a drive alone with a young gentleman.

—SUSAN M. Blackheads can be removed only by persistent washing the face with warm water and fine soap. Steaming the face once or twice to open the pores will help to remove them. They are simply accumulations of dirt in the pores of the skin. Massage is excellent in promoting the circulation of the blood, and, therefore, helps to a good complexion. Avoid sweets, candies and greasy food, take plenty of exercise, plenty of sleep and keep the body free from effete matter by regular habits, and your skin will not be sallow. Outdoor air is good for the skin, which is beautiful when one's health is perfect.

Studying the Bible*

FIRST, it must be a method which carries us back to the original authorities, to the inspired records of the four Gospels. Not one of the modern Lives of Christ, nor all of them put together, can take the place of the Gospel record. Later we may turn to some of the excellent Lives of the Master for help in understanding particular points of geography, Jewish life and thought, manners and customs, but the foundation of all our knowledge must be laid in an earnest and prayerful study of the Gospels themselves. We cannot enter into the full meaning of the words and deeds of Christ until we know their place in the fourfold Scripture story, the connection in which they were spoken, or the circumstances under which they were enacted. And we cannot gain this knowledge without working for it. Neither this handbook nor any other can take the place of close and conscientious study. The most it can do is to help you to study aright. After it has shown you the way and started you on the right path, you must do the work of climbing. If you are unwilling to do this, you had better give this little volume to another. No book and no person can study for you or give you the blessing which comes from a reverent reading and conscientious comparing of the four inspired records.

Again, if our method of study is a right method, it will be a simple one; so simple, at least in its beginnings, that a child may understand it. If the principles of our method are as simple as they ought to be, we should be able to explain them to the members of the infant class, and to be able to use them in that department of the Church's work. If our method is simple, free from all complexity, it will also be natural; and its naturalness and simplicity will make their own appeal to the student. We shall not be obliged to argue for our method's acceptance, it will be understood and accepted on its own merits.

We have failed to grasp the Life of Christ in its oneness, largely because whatever instruction we received in our early years was along artificial lines. There was no presentation of Christ's earthly life as a simple and perfectly natural human life. There has been a mistaken idea that because his is a divine life, therefore it was to be studied from a very different standpoint from which a human life would be studied. But in the life of the man Jesus Christ, it is the absence of all conventionality and artificiality, it is its supreme simplicity and perfect naturalness that makes it easy to study, provided that we approach it with a right method.

An Ex-Empress in Old Age†

HUSBAND and son being both gone, there was no reason why Eugenie should not return to France if she wished; but although she would otherwise gladly do so, she cannot tear herself away from England as long as the remains of those she loved are there. From time to time, however, she revisits the places where she was once admired by all, and she has been seen and recognized at various times in Paris and at Fontainebleau, standing as a mere tourist in the rooms she once occupied as a sovereign lady. When the crown jewels were exhibited, previous to being sold at auction, she also came incognito to gaze with tear-dimmed eyes upon the glittering stones which were associated with so many brilliant memories.

When the Empress visits Paris, she lodges in her own house near her former palace, for, as she herself stated, soon after her son's death: "I feel myself drawn to the spot where the Tuileries stood, as moths are attracted by the light." As Eugenie is no longer "dangerous," according to political standards, she is allowed to wander at will in the capital, where she muses over the sad changes in her fortune, and recalls memories, which by contrast, make the present seem desolate indeed.

In these mournful pilgrimages, Eugenie has generally been accompanied by Mademoiselle Lebreton, the lady who fled with her from the Tuileries, and who has since then proved her constant and ever-faithful companion. We are told that poor Eugenie has wept so many bitter tears that the eyes, about which every one raved, are now dim and almost sightless. Her beautiful Titian hair is as white as snow, and her once erect and graceful form is bent and bowed by acute attacks of rheumatism. She and her companion have visited sundry bathing resorts in quest of relief for the tortures she endures from this disease, but all in vain, and the fact that she suffers so much, makes her seem far older than her actual years, although she has now passed the allotted three score and ten.

PROPHECY BEING FULFILLED*

Dr. Herzl, the Leader of the Zionist Movement, Honored by the Sultan

STUDENTS of prophecy have always realized that one of the first signs of the approach of the Second Coming of Christ, would be the gradual restoration of the Jews to their own land. Until the last three years, there seemed little prospect of such an event. Intensely as many of the Jews desired once more to gain possession of the holy city, the Sultan of Turkey held fast his grip and would not hear of any concession. Latterly, however, as our readers are aware, he has been induced to consider a proposal which would permit of the Jews occupying Palestine, while leaving the Sultan in possession of the country as supreme ruler. The proposal takes the form of a lease. It gives the Sultan the advantage of a secure income without the trouble and expense of collecting taxes, which is an advantage he can appreciate. It also relieves him of the necessity of maintaining a military force in the country, as the Jews would obtain from other European powers a guarantee of freedom from molestation. Dr. Herzl has been to Constantinople to urge the project personally. The following is a report of the results so far as they are known:

Soon after his arrival, Dr. Herzl was visited by an adjutant, who requested him to come to the palace, where the Sultan accorded him an audience, which lasted the unusual length of two and a-half hours. At the close, the Sultan conferred on Dr. Herzl the grand cordon of the Medjidie Order, one of the highest honors in the gift of the Ottoman Sovereign. The next day, Dr. Herzl was again commanded to go to Yildiz Kiosk, and remained there from 11.30 to 4 P.M. Two days later, Dr. Herzl and Herr Wolfsohn were requested, at 9 A.M., to pay a third visit to Yildiz Kiosk, and remained there till 5 P.M. Before finally taking leave of the deputation, the Sultan presented Dr. Herzl with a pin set in brilliants.

Whatever is known in the inner circles of the Zionist movement as to the exact purport of the request made to the Sultan by Dr. Herzl, is being carefully guarded until it shall be officially revealed by Dr. Herzl himself. It has, however, transpired that at the end of the third and most protracted of the audiences granted Dr. Herzl, he came away well satisfied with the result of his mission, and sanguine as to the future of the movement. It may be assumed, therefore, that something of the character of a "charter" has been agreed to by the Ottoman ruler, and therefore arises the question in how far such a document has the support of the other powers, as desired by the "publicly recognised" part of the programme adopted at the first Zionist Congress. All these matters will, no doubt, be gone into by a confidential committee at the next congress, but it is an open secret that the movement has more than the sympathetic support of the German Emperor, who received Dr. Herzl in Berlin, Potsdam, Constantinople, and Jerusalem. Dr. Herzl was in evidence at the Peace Conference at The Hague, and there obtained the ear of some notables, and especially of French politicians. The English Foreign Office has not ignored the movement; on the contrary, it has kept itself well informed on the subject, and has displayed some sympathy toward it.

The position would, therefore, appear to be that which it assumed when Laurence Oliphant went to Constantinople in 1880. Lord Salisbury then told Oliphant, in so many words, that he would help him to get the good will of the other powers; but the British Government would not officially give its support until other powers showed their willingness to do likewise. Experts on Turkish law are practically agreed that the division of the Empire into vilayets, which are again subdivided into pashaliks, with certain rights of autonomous government, enables the Sultan to make concessions for settlement and autonomous administration without raising international questions. Dr. Herzl, on his side, has, no doubt, avoided it by ignoring the holy places.

GETTYSBURG, LURAY, AND WASHINGTON.

Personally Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

This early Autumn tour covers a section of the country at once interesting and attractive. The battlefield of Gettysburg, with its hundreds of monuments; the picturesque Blue Mountains, touched with the first breath of frost; the Shenandoah Valley, reminiscent of Sheridan's Ride; the Caverns of Luray, one of Nature's wonder places, and Washington, the capital and political centre of the United States, offer a programme of delight.

The tour will leave New York and Philadelphia Saturday, September 14, in charge of one of the company's tourist agents, and will cover a period of five days. A chaperon, whose special charge will be unescorted ladies, will accompany the party throughout the trip. Round-trip tickets, covering transportation, carriage drives, and hotel accommodations, will be sold at the extremely low rate of $25 from New York, $24 from Trenton, $22 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1106 Broadway, New York; 4 Court Street, Brooklyn; 780 Broad Street, Newark, N. J., or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

KNOWLEDGE OF FOOD.

Proper Selection of Great Importance in Summer.

The feeding of infants is a very serious proposition, as all mothers know. Food must be used that will be easily digested, or the un-digested parts will be thrown into the intestines and cause sickness. It is important to know that a food can be obtained that is always safe; that is Grape-nuts.

A mother writes: "My baby took the first grarium at a baby show on the 8th inst., and in every way a prize baby. I have fed him Grape-Nuts since he was five months old. I also use your Postum Food Coffee for myself." Mrs. L. F. Fishback, Alvin, Tex.

Grape-Nuts food is not made solely for a baby food by any means, but is manufactured for all human beings who have trifling, or serious, difficulties in the stomach or bowels. One especial point of value is that the food is predigested in the process of manufacture, and by any drugs or chemicals whatsoever, but simply by the action of heat, moisture, and time, which permits the diastase to grow, and change the starch into grape-sugar. This presents food to the system ready for immediate assimilation.

Its especial value as a food, beyond the fact that it is easily digested, is that it supplies the needed elements to quickly rebuild the cells in the brain and nerve centers throughout the body.

"Honor the Holy Ghost!"

The Identity of the Mysterious Messenger who Gave this Advice to Mr. Moody at Last Revealed—A Striking Incident in the Great Evangelist's Life

IN the summer of 1859 I was teaching a class of small boys in the Sabbath School of Bedford Congregational Church, Brooklyn. A large accession to my class of boys of German parentage led me to visit their homes, and I found between Brooklyn and East New York, then known as New Brooklyn, a large settlement of German tailors.

In September of that year I hired a store at the corner of Patchen avenue and Chauncey street, and, with the help of another young man, started a Mission Sunday School. The first Sunday we had 38, the second 72, and the third 112. We had our hands full. A year and a half later we had begged the money to buy four lots on the corner of Rochester avenue and Herkimer street, where we built a pretty chapel and moved into it, adopting the name, "Rochester Avenue Mission." We had occupied it about a year, when we had a visit from Dwight L. Moody. One Saturday in 1862, about noon, I was walking down Nassau street, New York, and observed before me one of our mission school teachers, Mr. C. K. Howlett. He turned down Ann street. "Can it be that he is going in by the back door to the Fulton street prayer-meeting?" I asked myself. "Well, if Howlett can afford to spend an hour in prayer in the middle of the day, I guess I can." So I followed, and caught him just as he entered the church. The settees were very close together and the room was packed like a box of sardines.

A young man from Chicago spoke and told some wonderful experiences. I said to Mr. Howlett, "When they stand to sing the last hymn, I will slip to the aisle and go for that young man and get him to come to our school to-morrow." (It was Quarterly Sunday, when we always had an outsider to speak). I made the attempt, but before I could get to him he was surrounded by a dozen men, all questioning him. I caught his eye at last and I said, "Stranger, will you go to my Sunday School to-morrow?" "Can't go; got an engagement at Lee avenue." "Come to us first," I persisted, "for we meet half an hour earlier than they do, and are not far from them. We are on Fulton avenue; the cars pass the door." "Can't go; never ride in cars on Sunday," was the ready answer.

At this I jumped forward, shoved one man to the right, another to the left, and I was face to face with this strange young man. He was twenty-four or twenty-five years old, full of fire, a model of manly strength and beauty. I said, "We need you so much, I won't take no for an answer. I'll have a carriage to meet you at Fulton Ferry, and bring you to our school; also, when we are through with you, to take you to Lee avenue and get you there in time." He drew back, looked me over as if he would say, "What kind of a beggar are you?" Then, with a jerk, he whipped out of his vest pocket a silicate tablet, and, handing it to me, said: "Write it down there." I wrote and handed it to him. He read it, and said curtly: "I'll be there."

When he entered the school, Mr. John G. Fay, of the Sands Street Methodist Church, was speaking. We sang a hymn, and I then turned to Mr. Moody. He went down the two steps at the side of the platform, stepped forward to the first class, and for half an hour poured out his soul in wonderful exhortation and story. Then, kneeling on the floor, he prayed. There were no dry eyes in that crowded room. As he went toward the door, he spoke to one and another, right and left, and was gone.

Next Monday I was again at the Fulton street noon prayer meeting. As soon as it closed, Mr. Moody came to me and said, "Has that young man become a Christian who sat in the front seat?" "Not to my knowledge." "You don't tell me so! I have been praying for him all the morning."

I met Mr. Moody many times afterward, but he never again referred to his first visit to our school. Some fourteen or fifteen years after that visit, he (Moody) was engaged to speak in the Bedford Church, Brooklyn, and he was, with myself, the guest of Mr. C. D. Wood, on St. Mark's avenue. Seated at the table, he had no sooner asked a blessing than he said to our host, abruptly, "By the way, there was an incident which happened to me when I was with this man," pointing over his shoulder toward me, "that influenced me probably more than any single incident of my life. It was when I first began to speak. I had come down to New York, and he met me and got me out to his little school. I was getting into the carriage to go away when some one touched me on the shoulder. I turned, and saw an old man, with white hair blowing in the wind, and his finger pointing at me. He said, 'Young man, when you speak again, Honor the Holy Ghost!' I got into the carriage and drove away, but the voice was continually ringing in my ears; yet I did not understand it. It was six months afterwards before God revealed to me the meaning of that message—that I was entirely dependent upon the Holy Spirit. From that day to this, I seldom stand before a great audience where I don't see that old man, with his outstretched finger, and hear his voice, 'Honor the Holy Ghost!' Cutter, do you know who that old man was?"

I told him I did not. We had no teacher in our school who would answer the description. A few weeks later, Mr. Moody held several meetings in Dr. Talmage's church, and at one of them he related the story. I afterward met Mr. D. O. Calkins, a neighbor, who asked me if I had read in the Eagle Mr. Moody's story "Honor the Holy Ghost." I replied, "Why, certainly; it happened at our school." "But do you know who the old man was?" "No." "Don't you remember that Mr. Lee's church, of which I was a member, was broken up and scattered? For four months I had no church home, and during that time you came for me to go out to your school, and take for three Sabbaths the class of a teacher who was out of town, and I went. One of those days, this young man, Moody, from Chicago, spoke. I said to myself, 'he means well, but this is all transient, I must speak to him.' Twice I started to do so, but sat down again, thinking it was none of my business. At last, when he had gone out, I felt I must go and speak to him; but had no time to get my hat."

The late Edward Hawley told of being with Mr. Moody somewhere about the time of this incident in a revival at a Sunday School Convention at Springfield, Ill. On their return to Chicago, they were telling in the meetings of the Young Men's Christian Association what great things had been done, when Col. Hammond, of the Rock Island Railroad, broke in; "You are telling us what Hawley did, and what Moody did; but I want to tell you that neither of you did anything, for the Holy Spirit alone can change the heart." I wonder if this message from God, through Col. Hammond, was that to which Mr. Moody referred when he said, "Six months afterwards, God revealed to me that I was entirely dependent upon the Holy Ghost." At a commemorative service held in Dr. Carson's church, in January, 1890, I heard Mr. D. W. McWilliams say, that when a committee waited on Mr. Moody to invite him to speak in the Brooklyn Rink, he said it was in Brooklyn, when he was beginning his work, that he had received from God a message which had affected him more than any single incident of his life.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

N. E. G., Dickinson, Tex., writes: I prayed God to save my daughter from a friend ship hurtful to her, and he answered my prayer.

M. E. D., Freeland, Mo., writes: A dear one for whom I have prayed for years has been saved, and is now with Jesus. Can we believe God and yet not believe he answers prayer?

M. D. S., Baltimore, Md., writes: My life has been one answered prayer. I am learning to take all my cares to God. He "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think."

Mrs. F. T., Loogootee, Ill., writes: When I saw the "Answered Prayers" column I was happy indeed. I prayed for my husband to be saved, and now he writes me he has found his Saviour. My neighbor lends me her papers to read, that is how I saw the "Answered Prayers."

Mrs. T. N., Ogdensburg, N. Y., writes: A friend of mine gives me THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to read, and I saw in it where people testify to the power of prayer. I want to tell how I asked the Lord to bless my boy and keep him from company I thought bad for him, and likely to lead him astray, and how the Lord has answered my prayer.

A. B., Josephine, Mont., writes: I thank God for prayers answered this summer. A great sorrow has been lifted from many hearts through prayer.

A. W. H., Worcester, Mass., writes: I will praise God while I have my being because he has saved my child. "He has given me the desire of my heart, and not withholden the request of my lips."

N. B., Illinois, writes: It strengthens one's faith to read "Answered Prayers." That column is the first one I look for as I open my paper. I was in great trouble, and I went to God in earnest prayer; even when all hope seemed gone, I said, "Though the Lord slay me yet will I trust him." Shortly after help came, hope revived, and the Lord answered my prayers.

R. C. Ticonic, Ia., writes: I prayed that a great burden be lifted from me, and God in his own miraculous way answered my prayer. I am not a Christian; but I must testify to God's goodness to me.

Mrs. K. D., Swanton, Vt., writes: I wish to acknowledge, through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, special answers to three prayers. Why not sign one's full name?

"For years I have not been able to drink coffee, as it made me very nervous and gave me a headache. No one loved coffee more than I and it was a severe trial to abandon its use. Nearly three years ago I saw Postum Cereal Coffee advertised and concluded to try it.

I have been so well pleased with it and its healthful effects that I have used it ever since. I carry packages with me when I visit other places.

When I began to drink Postum, my muscles were flabby, as my habits are sedentary, but for the past two years my muscles have been hard and I never felt stronger in my life than I do now at sixty years of age, and I attribute my strength of muscle to constant use of Postum. I drink it three times a day. I feel so enthusiastic about Postum that I cannot recommend it too highly wherever I go. Wishing you great success, yours truly, Rev. A. F. Moore, 474 Rhode Island Street, Buffalo, N. Y."

The reason Postum builds up the human body to a prime condition of health, is that when coffee is left off, the drug effects of the poison disappear and the elements in Postum unite with albumen of the food to make gray matter and refill the delicate nerve centres all over the body and in the brain. This sets up a perfect condition of nerve health, and the result is that the entire body feels the effect of it.

Carrie Nation in New York

MRS. CARRIE NATION

MRS. CARRIE NATION, the famous Kansas anti-saloon agitator, paid a flying visit to New York on August 19, stopping only one day. During her short stay she visited police headquarters and had a spirited interview with Police Commissioner Murphy, of whom she asked some very pointed questions concerning the New York saloons and their violation of the Sunday law. Her vigorous style of interrogation was not enjoyed by the commissioner, who finally cut the interview short. Before leaving town, Mrs. Nation paid a visit to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, whither she was followed by a number of reporters. She recalled the fact that at the outset of her anti-saloon work in the West, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had spoken of her very kindly. "I'm a plain woman," she said, "and make no pretensions to fine education, but I can tell them the truth about the saloons, and the people want to hear it." She declared that the saloon was the cause of the greater part of the crime and misery that afflict society. Mrs. Nation purposed returning to New York and speaking to its people in Carnegie Hall, where she will tell the thrilling story of her western campaign. She is in excellent health, and speaks with a vigor and determination that indicate no relaxation of her remarkable energies.

The Site of Calvary

IN an interesting article in the current number of Travel, Mr. C. E. Johnstone discusses the probable site of Calvary. He says:

More than fifty years ago it occurred to certain people that a hill on the north side of Jerusalem, not far from the Damascus Gate, and close to the Grotto of Jeremiah, seemed to fulfil many of the conditions which were required for the site of Christ's tomb. Here, too, the evidence of tradition comes in, with even greater force than in the other case, for it is known among the Jews as the "Hill of Execution"; and to this day it is their custom, when they pass it by, to spit and throw stones at it, cursing at the same time the destroyer of their nation, who aspired to be a king. Until comparatively recent years the slaughter-house, which was of great antiquity, stood close by; and this seemed to agree with the well-known text, "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter." And now comes the very curious and interesting story of the way in which General Gordon was led towards the acceptance of this theory. His mind was, one side at any rate, of a distinctly mystic character, and had a firm belief in the literal and tangible fulfilment of prophecy. Standing one day on a hill at some distance from Jerusalem, General Gordon caught sight of a valley, winding in snake-like fashion up towards the Holy City, and by a sudden intuition he said to himself, "This is the serpent mentioned in the book of Genesis, whose head the seed of the woman is to bruise." The next step, as he believed, was to trace this valley up to the hill which formed its head, and there would be the true site of the Golgotha. With this idea in his mind, he followed the serpent windings of the valley until they landed him upon the hill outside the Damascus Gate, which now bears his name. Fired with what seemed to him immediate success, he began to search eagerly for further evidence to confirm the authenticity of this site. The curious rocky formation on the summit of the hill did undoubtedly, in certain lights, bear a striking resemblance to the outline of a skull, which would fully account for its having received the name of Golgotha.

Below the hill was a garden, which might easily have been the Garden of Joseph of Arimathea, and further patient search in this garden brought to light a tomb, which corresponds with the tomb that is described in the Gospels. In the first place, it is undoubtedly a Jewish tomb of about the time of Herod, and, moreover, it is hewn out of the living rock. In the second place, its size and careful construction go to show that it was a grave belonging to a man of some wealth and position; and the fact that, in certain details, it is still incomplete, points strongly to its having been quite new at the time when it was used for its most sacred purpose, after which it is only natural to suppose that it would remain unused. There is room in it for separate graves for several bodies, but only one of these had been completed. Outside, the groove in which the stone that acted as a door was rolled is still visible.

It has been objected that this hill is too far from the road for the passers-by to have been able to speak to the Saviour as he hung upon the cross. It is, however, within less than a hundred yards of the place where the two great roads running from north to south and from east to west cross one another; and it is sufficiently obvious that on the occasion of an execution people would turn aside from the main road to come and see what was going on.

Thanks to the efforts of General Gordon, the garden in which the tomb was discovered has been purchased, so that it is secured from future interference.

This, very briefly stated, is the account of what is called Gordon's Calvary, and its claims to rival the traditional site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

A Triumph of the Gospel

EVANGELIST John C. Redding, of York, Nebraska, has just closed a very successful series of open-air tent meetings in Larned, Kansas. All the members of the various churches of the city took an active part in the tabernacle meetings and a feeling of unity was created as a result. Many souls were led to see the glories of a better life. At the close of the meetings, Mr. Redding delivered a lecture on the ups and downs of his life. He has had a remarkable career. At the age of thirteen, he began life as a "bound boy," being sent from Indiana to a farmer in Kansas, where he lived until the age of twenty, when he ran away from his taskmaster and began life for himself. He was married at an early age and became quite prosperous in his business affairs. Dissipation followed, his money vanished, and he led the life of a tramp and drunkard for some years. His better nature at last triumphed over the evil, and he was converted, reconciled to his family, took up the work of his Heavenly Master, and has been a faithful servant for the past twelve years. His work has extended over a great part of Kansas and Nebraska, besides much time spent in other States. Mr. Redding is now spending a few weeks in the mountains of Colorado, before taking up his work for another year. J. A. C.

The Ball-Bearing Washer is unquestionably the greatest labor-saving machine ever invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. There are no wheels, paddles, rockers, crank, complicated machinery. It revolves on big ball-bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required, a child can operate it.

No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes, water and soap all that is needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in 6 minutes. Impossible to injure the most delicate fabrics.

CHICAGO, July 13, 1900.
Last week I started to wash with your 1900 Ball-Bearing Washer. A neighbor saw me wash my boys' waists (which were terribly dirty) and was both surprised to see there was not a spot left. On Monday we did a big wash of 15 machinefuls and a work was done in 4 hours. It is the best machine I ever saw (and I have tried many). It works so well that my little boy can run it. MRS. A. H. A Southern Gospel Singer

According to a place of honor in its columns to musicians who devote their whole talent to Gospel service and the uplifting of their fellows, instead of lending to secular ends and amusements, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doubtless pointing many gifted men and women the high path of duty in the use of song and minstrelsy. Among those artists who have dedicated their gifts to the Master's work, should be included the name of Sara MacDonald Sheridan—a name known and loved throughout the South, and in many parts of the East as well.

Mrs. Sheridan has declined many offers to sing in grand opera. Her voice—a rich, so contralto—is of extraordinary power, sweetness and purity. It has been well-tried, is true and flexible. From the beginning, her principal work has been in homes of worship. For thirteen years she sang in the choirs of the First M. E. Church, Atlanta, Ga., and of the Hebrew Temple. During a summer holiday, some years ago, she took a journey North, and was heard in churches and at sacred concerts in many places, and her voice has been often heard at Mr. Wanamaker's church in Philadelphia.

Fact which adds a note of interest to this woman's career, is that she did not selfishly take up the study of her art very early in life. She was a wife and mother when reverses came, and with it, her call to cultivate her voice and use it for the help of her loved ones. Her musical training was done to the accompaniment of a weak piano and in the midst of household duties faithfully performed. When the public recognized the beauty of her voice and stage managers made handsome overtures for it, the singer—though she could have made much money and won fame by consenting, said: "No; I would rather sing the songs of Zion in the courts of my God." In addition to helping the world by her singing, which has been an inspiration and benediction to so many, Mrs. Sheridan is helping the world to be better in more practical ways, for she is known in Atlanta as one of the most faithful, humble and earnest charity workers.

THE WAY OF EMANCIPATION

The Victim of Inebriety and Other Sins pointed to the Only Sure Way of Deliverance

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHILE the heart of man is away from God, he cannot but be a prey to the enemy of souls, he cannot but be a slave to sin, in one form or another. Know ye not that to whom ye present yourselves as bond-servants [R.V. marg.] unto obedience, his bond-servants ye are whom ye obey whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness (Rom. 6:16)? The root of the drunkard's sin and misery is not so much the amount of temptation, terrible as it is, which surrounds him, but the lack of the relation to God which would bind him in heart and will to him who has the will and power to keep him from evil.

If a man whose nature tends to self-indulgence, whose environment and associations lead him to indulge in that which procures him temporary gratification, and enables him for a time to forget things which he wants to forget—if such a man has no power other than his own already-enslaved will to fight against his sin, he is indeed to be pitied. And such is the case with almost all the slaves to spirituous liquors, to opium in all its forms, to tobacco, or any other thing by which the body is brought into an unnatural condition, neither responding to God, nor yet to the power of self-government, which God placed in unfallen man.

The way out of bondage is to turn our own will, as far as we are masters of it, towards the only hope for Satan's slave; the re-establishment of our primary relation to God. How can a lost man or woman, a bondsman to drink, opium, smoking, impurity, speculation, frivolity, or any of Satan's chains, break through his prison-house and be free? Let the slave of sin go to the best source of information, the Word of God, and read for himself, whether God is to be trusted. Let him seek some word which will show him whether God hates him because of his sin, or whether God loves him while he hates his sin. "God so loved the world," with all the drunkards in it, "that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever—even the most enslaved drunkard—believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Is this true, and is it true for me? Can God love me, who hate myself? If this is true, then there is hope for me. If this is true, God does not want me to perish. If this is true, then God is on my side, and my side is stronger than that of the devil and all his angels. I may, I can, I will, be a free man. Yes, free from myself, free from the devil, free from the drink, free from sin, that I may not be free to wander from and grieve God. He that believeth, i. e., he who goes on believing—doing nothing, going nowhere, but in dependence upon and obedience to God, to please him—he it is who has eternal life, the very life of Jesus Christ (John 1:42). He hath the Son, and hath life; not forgiveness only, because he believes that Jesus bore his sins on the cross, but life, because he believes that Christ is in him, the hope of glory (Col. 1:27), and he knows that greater is he that is in him than he that is in the world (1 John 4:4). Greater is he that dwells within him than he (Satan) who tempts him from without.

Oh, if the slaves of the enemy could only believe there is a way out of their prison-house, how many might be saved who go down into a hopeless, dishonored grave! Why do men not believe in God, and in his Son Jesus Christ? For the most part because they have so strong a belief in themselves. They say, "I have tried to get free, but I cannot; I have inherited the craving for drink from my ancestors, and I cannot help it." This may be only too true, but it is just such whom Jesus saves, if they will give up trying to save themselves. "Be not deceived," writes the apostle Paul, "neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you; but ye are sanctified; but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of God." "Such were some of you," perhaps such as inherited the tendency to these sins. And now? "In one spirit were we all [you Corinthians who have been such sinners, and I, Paul, the chief of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15)] baptized into one body [the body of Christ (ver. 12)] . . . and have been all made to drink into one Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:13, R.V.).

"But," some may say, "I have believed in Christ; I do not know, though I hardly dare to say it, that my sins are forgiven me for Christ's sake, and yet, from time to time, I fall again. I hate myself for it, but it overcomes me. Why is this?" Our only safety is constant prayer, and prayer in faith, believing all the time we pray that God is on our side; and stronger than he that is in the world, and against us. If we are in the habit of asking God where he would have us go, and what he would have us do, then he keeps us out of the way of temptation. How many there are who, for want of thus getting direction from God, are continually going to clubs or to saloons, where the temptation to intemperance is all around them! No wonder, then, that they fall.

Self-indulgence is at the root of all fleshly sins. Our beloved Lord came into the world saying, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O my God [I am content to do it]; yea, thy law is within my heart." If Christ is in us, there is in our very hearts, in him in us, the same spirit. And if we acknowledge his presence within us, and ignore or deny our own presence—i. e., our will and tastes—in favor of him whose right it is to reign, we shall reap the fruit of his life in us. Then, instead of the horrible picture of Prov. 33, the very men of whom this has been a photograph will show the traces of Jesus in their face and in their lives. How many a reformed drunkard who has become a true saint of God has also become a transformed drunkard, by becoming conformed to the image of God's Son (Rom. 8:29)! And this has come about by his beholding as in a glass, the glass of God's Word, the glory of God, and being changed into the same image "from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" (II. Cor. 3:18).

If this paper should fall into the hands of any man or woman who has become a slave to some dominating fleshly sin, let them come to God only through him who was made sin for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him (II. Cor. 5:21). Christ came into the world to save sinners (1 Tim. 1:15), to change utterly those who have inherited sinful propensities; the more desperate a case, the more is he glorified in his conquest. But he would have us entirely on his side, our whole spirit and soul and body, our will, our affections, and all. He tells us, "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price" (1 Cor. 6:19). Are such terms severe? Are they anything but the reasonable service of those for whom he has left heaven, become a man, and suffered shame and death? Oh, let us love him who has so loved us, and offer him no grudging service, but glorify his name in the whole of life which is left to us!

Forgave his Father's Slayers

Mrs. Lydia Lord Davis, of Ravenna, O., is the widow of one of the martyred Christian missionaries of Shansi, her husband having been one of the last of the Boxer victims. Mrs. Davis and her children came back to the United States after her bereavement. In a recent letter to the Rev. S. L. Baldwin, she writes:

"I send you a draft for $5.37 for the famine in Shansi. My little son William, eight years old, collected the money, and he was very glad to do it. I thought it would be a great lesson to him in the line of forgiveness. Dear little boys, they miss their father very often! I hope that this will reach you in safety, and that the money may do much good in Shansi, which is so dear to us."

Surely, here is the Christlike spirit, that a child should forgive and even seek to help the race that martyred his parent. If the widow and children of a missionary, who gave his life for the work, can so forgive, their beautiful example should not be without its effect upon others.

Missionary Work in Germany

There are now in Germany 23 Protestant missionary societies, with 551 main stations, 880 missionaries, 96 female missionaries (unmarried), 130 ordained and 4,160 other native helpers, 369,493 Christians, and 89,103 scholars in 1,829 schools, having 2,610 teachers.

THE Internal Bath

More Important than the External

If external cleanliness is essential to health how much more important is internal cleanliness? Every disease arises from the retention of waste and foreign matter in the system—Nature's drainage being clogged. In the vast majority of cases the clogging is in the colon or large intestine. Positively the one harmless and efficient means of clearing away this waste is the internal bath given with the

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers where necessary and to publish them in the order in which they are received.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append the name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Oct. 16

1. Would the use of a liturgy in church be more conducive to a devotional spirit than extemporaneous prayer?
2. When a young woman, who has received a college training and actually entered upon her profession, under good auspices, but who is it advisable to drop her profession, or to continue it to the fullest extent her relationship will permit?
3. A metaphor is used in the Bible to describe death, the law and God's care over his people. Name the metaphor and the places where it is used.
4. Can one love his child too much?
5. What should be done with lazy men who have families of small children, when they have acquired the habit of looking to benevolent people for the support of their children, who would starve if they were not helped?

Questions of the Week

1. In all the recorded acts of faith in the New or Old Testaments, performed by mortal man, what was the most marvelous, wonderful, and far-reaching, considering the time and the circumstances?

I take it that the most signal, outstanding, far-reaching instance of faith on record, is that of Abraham, when he offered his son Isaac in sacrifice, in obedience to God's command. There are a number of circumstances which combine to give this act of faith the supreme place which I claim for it. There was, first, the agonizing trial of a father's love in losing his only son by a violent death. Then this death had to be inflicted by the father's own hand. Then the father's agony was protracted for three days. We can conceive that even such an act might be done in some moment of highly-wrought devotion; but Abraham had to journey with his son for three days, with agonizing love tugging at his heart all the while to turn back. Then we have this supreme consideration, that Abraham believed that God would raise Isaac from the dead after he was sacrificed. The Epistle to the Hebrews makes it clear that this was the assurance by which Abraham was sustained. Isaac was the child of promise. God had assured Abraham that Isaac would be the father of a numerous seed. And now Isaac had to be sacrificed! How could the promise be fulfilled? Abraham believed that God would bring Isaac to life again rather than that his word should fail. And most probably Abraham had never heard of or known of any one being so raised from death. What man-Moses faith, then, was there!

2. What is the origin of the name "Red Sea"?

It was called by the Israelites simply "The Sea." Ex. 14: 2, 9, 10, 11, 18, and sometimes "The Sea of Suph" (Red Sea) Ex. 10: 19; 13: 18, meaning, probably, "of rush or sea-weed." It is called "The Red Sea" in Exodus 15: 4. In Num. 21: 14, and Deut. 1: 1, the authorized version translates "Red Sea." The Septuagint renders it also "Red Sea," except in Judges 11: 16. The origin of the name has been much debated. It was so called from the earliest times. Some attribute the name to certain natural phenomena, e. g., the red appearance of the mountains on its coast; the red color of its water, caused at times by zoophytes; the red coral in it; the red seaweed; the red storks of the neighborhood. Others find an etymological derivation for the name, as from Edom, literally translated "red." Greek and Roman legend tells us the sea was named from a great king, Erythras, "the red king," who reigned near-by. The best authorities, however, state that the chief family of Arabia Felix was the Himyerites—a name derived from the Arabian "Ahmar," red. "The Red Sea," therefore, was most probably the Sea of the Red Men."

G. E. KRAUTH.

In Burder's Oriental Literature, a rare old work, I find the following: "In the Red Sea there is a weed, called in the Ethiopic, sufa, which grows also in great quantities in India, and in divers parts of Asia. From it they prepare a food like almond milk; and extract from its flowers a red color, used for dyeing cloth in Ethiopia and India (Ezekiel 27: 16). As this weed, its seed, food, flower and color, are all denominated sufa, and as the sea it grows in lies between Ethiopia and Palestine, where sufa and suf or suf, respectively, signify rubrum (red), it hence appears that in Jerome's translation this sea is called Mare Rubrum, and in ours, the Red Sea, not from any such color appearing in its water, but from the weed suf, which Bruce (Trav. vol. II., p. 138) declares to be a crane."

hungry. Find the cause, and then seek to do what is going to be for the child's future good.

RUTH BARBER.

No one form of punishment is advisable for all children, or for any one child under all circumstances. In general it may be advised, let the punishment fit the occasion for it. For example, if the child is cross or peevish, let him be put to bed. If he quarrels with his brothers, sisters or playmates, punish him by keeping him away from them for a time. If told to help in some way about the dinner and he neglects, let him go without his favorite dish for that meal. In short, let the punishment, so far as possible, appear to the child to be a natural and legitimate consequence of his wrongdoing or disobedience. Generally, for negative faults, like neglect or carelessness, a deprivation of some valued or customary privilege will be more effective than whipping. Yet there is also a place for "the rod" in the training of most children. But it takes the "wisdom from above" to know when and how to use it. Indeed, that wisdom is needed all along in the training of a child. Nowhere is it needed more.

E. W. BUTLER.

4. Is it wise for a young lady, who wishes to advance the Christian cause, to make a vow never to accept in marriage one who is not a Christian?

It is unwise. Vows should never be made rashly or unnecessarily. This vow would be rash, because unthought of circumstances may arise which may cause her to regret her action, and unnecessary, because it will serve the Christian faith, and as free from women, who would be attracted to a with the nobility and independence kind here described. But matrimony should be the least thing considered. The living of a pure and holy life and the derivation of a noble and exalted service should be the main consideration. Many women cease to be useful Christians by marrying ungodly men, that I believe one would do well to take the vow. As said, in addition, that when a woman is asked in marriage by a man who is a Christian in everything but the name of the church connection, she could feel exempt from the vow, and accept him in the hope of bringing him into the church.

5. When a man is in debt, is he justified in spending any of his income for other than actual necessities while the debt remains unliquidated? Has he a right to go on vacation (for self or family), in Christmas or birthday gifts, or in charity or church offerings? Define the limit of his rights as possible, under such circumstances.

If a man is in debt beyond the reasonable expectation of paying within the proper time, then he must sustain very much the relation to his income, that would be of a moral insolvent toward his associates. In such a case he should consider that much might be used for himself as absolutely necessary. There is difference of opinion as to whether a debt which is of necessity and debt which is merely business accommodation. The insolvent or nearly so, but the other supported by collateral, either expressed or by implication. Now if one's debt is unpaid for, he should practice any degree of reasonable self-denial to be able to liquidate. If it is guaranteed properly, one is to go on as if he were not in debt, so far as the use of his money might be concerned, after he has made due allowance. The vacation for a man in debt is morally allowable if very seriously needs it, or is able to take and pay his debt. As for charity and church offerings, they should be paid out of all means, and when a man in debt has a certain income, some part of it should certainly go in those channels. That is not like the Christmas gift. Gifts to God's cause are debts from out of the sum of one's earnings, and to be paid in their own right, while the other funds go to liquidate the obligation to man.

3. What form of punishment is most advisable in dealing with children who need correction?

Punishments should be used sparingly for children. No parent should ever punish a child in anger or to vent the temper of the parent. A child, when punished, should only be done so for the helpfulness of the child, and as far as possible the child should be led to see that the parent does not punish arbitrarily, but for the child's own benefit. There should be some connection between the punishment and offence. The child who steals should be taught that it is a sin against God, and to seek his pardon, and to earn the value of the stolen property and repay it, etc. The parent must study the offence, the disposition of the child, and the circumstances under which the offence was committed. I believe if parents are Christians and, from the beginning, train the children aright, leading them to a saving knowledge of Christ in early childhood, there will be no question of punishment necessary, but only correction.

GRACE WEISER DAVIS.

That which will teach the child to do right in future because it is right, not for fear of punishment. Children differ in disposition; but if a child is punished for everything it will get used to it and learn to expect it. Take time to find out if the child intended to do wrong. My little girl says, "No mischief when baby is helping, but sometimes baby is mischief-box." Children have rights, and if they are treated like little men and women from babyhood they will seldom need punishment. Never slap a child because you are mad and must do something. A child never forgets unjust treatment. A boy who was whipped for everything grew up with little self-control and could never "give up" if ordered to do a thing, but a kind, serious talk from his employer brought cheerful obedience. Often a nap will settle a naughty child, that is really tired and nervous, and my little girl is often fretful and unreasonable when she is no good purpose. The young lady may not think it well for a Christian to contract marriage with a non-professor, but it is superfluous to pledge herself not to do so. It would seem quixotic; and it implies that her conviction is not altogether sufficient to lead her aright, but that it must be strengthened. A conviction is weak that requires an oath to reinforce it. The expression, "not a Christian," does not usually mean that the one spoken of is an unbeliever, but that he is a non-professor. He may be indifferent to Christianity, but tolerant in opinion, and susceptible to religious influences. I believe this to be commonly the case. Many wives influence their husbands religiously. Might not this young lady, under favorable circumstances, do the same? Let common sense and conscience guide when she makes her choice; she will then reject the one with whom she feels she will be unhappy, religiously or otherwise. A vow will not help her to do this. As a rule, the fewer vows affecting our future we make the better.

JAMES BELL MAJOR.

I believe it is wise. There are so many people who seem to think that an unmarried life is a serious disgrace to the one leading it, that it would be refreshing to hear of a lady who has firmly decided not to marry unless she can marry a worthy man—for no man who is not a Christian is worthy of a true Christian woman, no matter what may be his various qualities. Men are more scrupulous than women in this regard, for many un-Christian men will marry none but Christian women, thus selfishly asking so much more than they give. Contrary to the general opinion that a lady would ruin her chances for matrimony by taking such a vow, I believe that she would really better them, providing she possessed the qualities that men admire in women. In spite of all that may be said on the opposite of the question, there are many men in the world as true to God and

Miscellaneous Questions

C. E. P., Auburn, N. Y. Is it ever right to please and comfort people by gratifying their selfish desires?

Ordinarily speaking, it is not. There might be circumstances when policy would dictate otherwise; but we believe that for one with faith, it is always well to follow unswervingly the voice of conscience through the path of duty, leaving results to God.

H. B. H. What and where is the man-eating tree, and why is it so called?

Reader. Where and when did the custom of preaching funeral sermons?

The custom of pronouncing eulogies over the dead is very ancient—older than man or Grecian history. The modern funeral service is simply another form of this old custom.

President McKinley Shot by an Anarchist

His Life Attempted by Leon F. Czolgosz, in the Temple of Music, Buffalo, N. Y.—Wounded Twice, but will Probably Recover—The Assassin Arrested—World-wide Sympathy for the Sufferer

At a late hour on Friday afternoon, September 6, the whole nation was stunned by the news, telegraphed from the Pan-American grounds at Buffalo, that President McKinley had been shot and dangerously wounded by an Anarchist, in the Temple of Music, in presence of thousands of spectators. At first the news of the attempted assassination was received with incredulity; but soon all doubts were ended by corroboratory bulletins, which told in brief sentences, the story of the terrible crime.

A special arrangement, the afternoon had been set apart for reception to the President at the Temple of Music, and the general public had been invited. A little before 4 o'clock, Hon. John G. Milburn, President of the Exposition, made a brief speech introducing President McKinley to the three thousand auditors. Ten thousand more were standing outside, unable to get in. The crowd pressed forward to greet the President and shake hands with him. In the line was a little girl whose father led her up, and to whom Mr. McKinley, after shaking her hand, uttered some kind words, smiling and waving his hand at her as she departed. Next in the line was a dark-skinned, shaggy-browed, heavily-bearded Italian, and behind him came a young man, whose right hand was loosely swathed in a linen handkerchief, and held as though he had lately sustained an injury.

The Italian came forward and gripped the President's hand firmly, holding it so long that the officials in attendance remarked the incident. When he stepped aside the young man with the bandaged hand came forward and held out his free hand to President McKinley, who extended his right hand to clasp the other's left. At that instant the stranger thrust forward his right hand still covered with the handkerchief, and when it was within a few inches of the President's breast, a shot rang out, and a flash of fire spurted out from the handkerchief, which concealed a 32-calibre revolver. The President raised himself perceptibly on both feet, when struck. Instantly, another pistol shot was fired, this time the aiming lower and opposite the stomach.

The wounded President staggered, bent slightly forward and then sank back, being caught in the arms of Detective Geary, who stood beside him, and who was assisted in supporting him by President Milburn.

"Wonder if I am shot," the President is reported to have said, as they led him to a seat.

"I'm afraid you are," was Detective Geary's quick answer.

It would be impossible to describe adequately the exciting scene which followed the shooting. The great audience, comprehending the tragedy, surged forward in the direction of the assassin, who was seized by S. R. Ireland and George F. Foster, of the United States Secret Service. James F. Parker, a colored waiter,

One of the latter tore the handkerchief from the assassin's hand and seized the revolver, seeing which the crowd again surged forward with cries and menaces that boded ill for the miscreant. Women were hysterical and men acted like madmen. There were cries of: "He's shot the President! He's dead! oh! McKinley's dead!" The crowd roared and swayed, ever surging forward toward the assassin. Indeed, had not the police acted with great firmness and determination, the man would have been literally torn to pieces by the infuriated audience. According to some of the accounts by spectators near at hand, the assassin, while on the floor, fought desperately to free his right arm and to fire a third shot. As it was, he was beaten severely by the artillerymen and pounded with the policemen's clubs.

Meanwhile, thousands were gazing at the wounded President, who was borne to a chair by Detective Geary, President Milburn, Private Secretary Cortelyou and several Exposition officials. He was white but calm as he was laid back in the chair, one hand across his abdomen, the other feeling at his breast. It was seen that he was entirely conscious, and with open eyes was observing all that was taking place. Then he called in a faint voice for his secretary. "Cortelyou," he said, gasping out the words slowly, "Be careful about my wife—don't tell her about this." Secret Service Detective Foster, who stood beside him, says the President opened his waistcoat, and after fumbling about his breast a moment, said: "Foster, this feels like a bullet here." Foster put out his hand and felt a round protuberance under the skin. He said: "It does feel like one, Mr. President." "Well, we have got one of them, anyway," was the rejoinder, spoken feebly. As he moved a little to the left he saw, almost at his feet, the assassin, still prone and held down by his captors. The guard were still striking the man. President McKinley touched Mr. Cortelyou's arm with his right hand and said calmly, "Let no one hurt him. May God forgive him." He then sank back overcome by weakness, while the officers raised the assassin and took him away from the building.

Among those who now surrounded the wounded President, there was great excitement. Senor Aspiroz, the Mexican Minister, seeing the blood on the President's shirt bosom, and noting his deathly paleness, rushed forward, crying: "My God! Mr. President! are you shot?" and seemed about to throw himself at the sufferer's feet. "I believe—I am," came from the President's lips huskily. His head was now resting on Mr. Milburn's arm, and he seemed in a half-fainting condition. An ambulance from the Exposition Emergency Hospital had been summoned, and the sufferer was laid leaped upon him, and delivered a succession of heavy blows upon the assassin's face, felling him to the floor. A party of United States Artillery, doing duty at the Exposition, rushed forward, and so also did a number of Exposition police and other Secret Service detectives.

gently upon a stretcher and placed in the vehicle. Secretary Cortelyou and Mr. Milburn rode with him to the hospital. On the way, the President expressed regret at having been the cause of trouble to the Exposition.

Within a few minutes after the ambulance arrived at the hospital, it was surrounded by a large part of the crowd from the Temple of Music, where fully 50,000 persons had gathered. It was only by strategy that the assassin had been gotten away by the officers, without falling into the hands of the angry mob, which would have torn him to pieces. He was taken into a room at the northwest side of the Temple, where he was searched. A letter was found in one of his pockets which related to lodgings, but there was nothing else. After wiping the blood from his face, the officers asked his name, "Frederick Niemann," was the reply, given surlily, after a short silence. Being asked why he had attempted the President's life, he answered: "I am an Anarchist."

He was neatly dressed, but his clothes and his brown hair were dabbled with blood. A carriage was called, and with soldiers forcing back the crowd which raged furiously on all sides, Niemann was driven, under guard, across the esplanade, down the grand causeway, and through Lincoln Parkway to police headquarters, thousands following the entire distance. There were cries of "Lynch him! Murderer! Assassin!" but the guards succeeded in reaching headquarters safely with their prisoner.

While this scene was being enacted at the police station in front of the Emergency Hospital, thousands were clamoring for information as to the President's condition. Besides the hospital medical staff, there were with the President Dr. E. W. Lee of St. Louis, Dr. Storer of Chicago, and Dr. Van Pyma of Buffalo, who happened to be on the grounds at the time. Soon they were reinforced by the arrival of Drs. Matthew D. Mann, Herman Mynter, John Parmenter, and also Drs. Hall, Ellis, Harrington and Stockton. Six of the ablest physicians stood by the President's side while the nurses prepared for the work of the surgeons. After stripping the sufferer and examining his wounds it was found that the first bullet had struck the chest and deflected from the sternum to the right and traveled under the skin to a point near the nipple, where it was easily found and extracted, the wound being merely superficial. The second bullet had entered the abdomen, penetrating both walls of the stomach, but it could not be found.

The abdomen was opened, and the wounds in the walls of the stomach carefully closed with sutures, after which drainage tubes were inserted and the abdominal wound was closed. There was no apparent injury to the intestines. President McKinley stood the operation well, and his condition at the close was such as to justify hope of ultimate recovery. Dr. Mann performed the operation, assisted by Drs. Parmenter, Mynter and Presley M. Rixey—the latter the President's own physician. On the result of the operation and the favorable condition of the patient being communicated to the waiting thousands outside the hospital, there were general expressions of relief, and many a fervent prayer for his recovery. The various departments of the Fair were closed after the first news of the shooting, and all interest was centred on the sufferer and his condition.

At 7.45 P.M. the President was removed from the hospital to the home of Mr. Milburn, at Delaware avenue and Ferry street, where he had been stopping as a guest, and where Mrs. McKinley was resting, all unconscious of the tragic events of the afternoon. As the ambulance drove off with its precious burden, all heads were bared and the crowd stood in hushed silence. At this time, Mr. McKinley was fully conscious and rested easily on the stretcher, with his eyes open. He showed little or no traces of suffering from shock. His pulse, during the operation, was 130, and even when under the influence of the ether, his respiration was normal and his breathing at no time labored. His physicians were greatly encouraged, and unless complications arose, involving peritonitis, they believed recovery might be expected.

To Director-General Buchanan, of the Exposition, was assigned the delicate duty of breaking the news to Mrs. McKinley. She was deeply moved, but bore up bravely, and asked that her husband be brought to her at the Milburn cottage. This was only a few minutes before the arrival of the ambulance. When she entered the room where the wounded President lay on a cot (as cordial sympathy and full of earnest wishes for the sufferer's restoration were received from all quarters of the globe, including messages from the rulers of Europe and Asia. Never has any event brought out a more spontaneous and universal tribute of sympathy. A majority of the Cabinet came to the city, to be on hand for emergencies, and Vice-President Roosevelt arrived on Saturday from Syracuse. Should the President's injuries incapacitate him for any considerable time, Mr. Roosevelt will temporarily assume the duties of the Presidential office.

There is a good deal of mystery in connection with the prisoner, Niemann. To District Attorney Penney of Buffalo he made a statement, in which he declared that his real name is Leon F. C. Czolgosz. He admitted that he had planned the attack on the President a week before he made the attempt to kill him. He said he had no associates; he is an Anarchist, a disciple of Emma Goldman, the noted Anarchist agitator. He played the crime in Toledo, O. He had lived in Cleveland, O., where his parents and several brothers still live. On reaching Buffalo, where he tended to peddle Exposition souvenirs, he took up his abode at Nowak's Hotel, 1078 Broadway, giving the name of "John Doe." "I never had much luck at anything," he said in his statement to Mr. Penney, "this made me morose; but what started me to kill was a lecture I heard some time ago by Emma Goldman in Cleveland. She set me on fire. Her doctrine that rulers should be exterminated was what set me to thinking, so that my head nearly split with the thought. When I left the lecture, I had made up my mind to do something heroic for the cause I loved. I do not believe in the American form of government. I believe that any man who accepts the Presidency is a friend to the common people. He represents only the class of oppressors. I intended to kill the President of the United States. Against Mr. McKinley as a man I could have no feeling. I have been told that he is a good man. I did not wish to inflict suffering upon his family, but in accomplishing my purpose I could not control them. I am not sorry for what I have done. I have been simply an agent in the accomplishment of a work which, I hope, will succeed. I will take my punishment, no matter in what form it may come, like a man." The statement reads like that of a morbid and dangerous fanatic.

He is said to have lived in Detroit, where he had a bad record, having served a term in prison. Notwithstanding his denial, the police believe he had associates, and a number of suspects have been arrested in Buffalo, Cleveland and Chicago. Czolgosz's parents were Russian Poles of the poorer class, and his lack of education, together with the character of his early associations, made him shiftless, improvident, wandering, discontented with the world and a ready disciple for anarchist doctrine. There are no evidences of insanity, and those who have interrogated him do not believe him mentally irresponsible. His relatives in Cleveland regarded him as destitute of courage, and were astonished when told of his crime. By his own admission, there has been in communication with Anarchists in Chicago, Cleveland and other Western cities for several years. It is probable that his act will mark the beginning of a new and vigorous policy by the authorities for the suppression of anarchism, and may lead to stringent national legislation for the same purpose. Czolgosz will be prosecuted by the State. He has uttered no word of regret for his infamous deed.

those who were present say), she went up to the sufferer and took one of his hands in both of hers. He looked up at her tenderly and said, in a low tone but cheerfully:

"This is not our first battle, dear. We have won more desperate cases than this. We must bear up—both of us. If there were only one chance in a thousand I would accept it, and for your sake, hope to win."

They looked long into each other's faces and then her eyes filled. She bent over him a moment and then withdrew her hands, and was gently led away. Not a tear fell, but when she reached her own room, it is said, she gave way to the pent-up grief. Several hours later, when she had controlled herself, she reappeared in the sick room, not a trace of her late emotion visible. It was a splendid instance of wifely courage and devotion, and was remarked by all. She sat up with him the greater part of Friday night, and her presence gave the sufferer the greatest comfort. Troops guarded all approaches to the Milburn house to preserve perfect quiet. The President's sister and her daughters, from Canton, O., were telegraphed for, and other relatives were soon on the way to the sufferer's bedside.

Buffalo's leading streets were thronged with crowds eager to hear the news from the sick-room. The bulletins issued were reassuring. The sufferer slept well and took nourishment by hypodermic injections, his general condition being encouraging and practically free from pain. This improvement was continued on Sunday and the nation was devoutly thankful. Special prayers were offered in many churches throughout the country for the President's recovery. Telegrams of

As this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, the condition of the President continues favorable, and there are strong hopes of his ultimate recovery. All the physicians concur in regarding the symptoms as most encouraging. The second bullet, which is believed to be imbedded in the muscles of the back—has not been extracted, and is now probably encysted. By special arrangement, official bulletins signed by the President's physicians in attendance at his bedside, are telegraphed hourly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, New York, and our readers will thus be kept in close and sympathetic touch with the wounded President, and fully informed as to the progress of the case. Monday's bulletin

Sept. 9), showed a further improvement, the pulse having fallen from 122 to 112, and the temperature from 101 to 100.8; respiration, 28. All the physicians were gratified. Several of the President's relatives had arrived and were with him in the Milburn house, where an air of cheerfulness had displaced the former gloom. Tuesday's bulletins were even more favorable. At 7 A.M. the physicians announced that the patient had passed the most comfortable night since the attempt on his life: pulse 118, temperature 100.4, respiration 28. It was unofficially announced that the doctors, after consultation, had told the President that he would get well, the danger-point having been safely passed, but that he must remain quiet. Mr. McKinley, whose confidence in his ultimate recovery has been unshaken, replied, with a smile, that he had all along believed it. "President McKinley will be at his desk within the next six weeks," was the statement by Dr. McBurney on Tuesday morning, after seeing the invalid. Mrs. McKinley, who has been very brave throughout, when she heard the good news, said: "We trust in God, and believe my husband is going to recover speedily." Vice-President Roosevelt, Senator Hanna, and some of the President's relatives, were preparing to go home, feeling that the crisis was over. The chances of complication were steadily diminishing and all promised well. The Cabinet members were also preparing to return to Washington.

That no untoward complication may arise, and that the President may be speedily restored to health and strength, and spared to this nation and his family, for many years to come, is the fervent and universal prayer.

THE GREAT METHODIST COUNCIL

ONCE in ten years there is a general gathering of delegates from the Methodist churches in council. This is the third of the decennial periods in which the custom has been observed. In 1881 the meeting was held in London; in 1891 in Whittington, D. C.; this year in London again, and it is expected that in 1911 it will be held in Australia. About five hundred delegates are now in the English capital, three hundred of whom come from America. Among the branches of the great Methodist family represented in the council are: Methodist Episcopal; African Methodist Episcopal; Canadian Methodist; Wesleyan Methodists; New Connexion Methodists; Primitive Methodists; United Methodist Free Church, and Irish Methodists. The Conference has no legislative functions, but is convened for consultation and mutual edification. The resolutions, which may be passed, will, however, be received by the churches with the respect due to the high character and wide experience of the distinguished men who compose the great assembly.

Among the subjects to be discussed by the Conference are: "The Present Position of Methodism," "The Influence of Methodism in the Promotion of International Peace," "Biblical Criticism and the Christian Faith," "Principles of Protestantism vs. Sacerdotalism," "Methodism and Education," "Christianity and Modern Unbelief," "Modern Indifferentism," "Methodist Literature and Journalism," and "Practical Methods of Dealing with the Liquor Traffic." A public meeting will be held at which "The Moral Unity of the English-Speaking Peoples" will be the subject discussed.

The Conference is being held in the famous City Road Chapel, built by John Wesley in 1760, and sometimes called "The Cathedral of Methodism." Wesley is buried in the graveyard at the rear. The portraits below are of conspicuous delegates from America.

CHURCH ATTENDANCE INCREASING

TEXT—Hebrew 10: 25

Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together

STARTLING statements have been made in many of the pulpits and in some of the religious newspapers. It is heard over and over again that church attendance in America is in decadence. I deny the statement by presenting some hard facts. No one will dispute the fact that there are more churches in America than ever before, one denomination averaging two new churches every day of the year. The law of demand and supply is as inexorable in the kingdom of God as it is in the world. More churches supplied argues more church privileges demanded. More banks, more bankers. More factories, more manufacturers. More ships, more importers. More churches, more attendants.

In all our cities within a few years churches have been built large enough to swallow up two or three of the old time churches. I cannot understand with what kind of arithmetic and slate-pencil a man calculates when he comes to the conclusion that church attendance in America is in decadence. Take the aggregate of the number of people who enter the house of God now, and compare it with the aggregate of the people who entered the house of God twenty-five years ago, and the present attendance is four to one. The facts are most exhilarating instead of being depressing. That man who presents the opposite statistics must have been most unfortunate in his church acquaintance.

You are not to argue adversely because here and there a church is depleted. Churches have their day. Sometimes merchandise will entirely occupy a neighborhood and crowd out the churches and families ordinarily attendant upon them. Sometimes a church perishes through internecine strife. But there are no facts to overthrow the statement that I have made in regard to the increasing attendance upon the house of God. Now I am ready to admit, as every intelligent man will admit, that there are churches which have been depleted, and it is high time that a sermon be preached for the benefit of young men who are just entering the Gospel ministry, and for the warning of prosperous churches as to what are the causes of decline in any case. If merchandise crowd out a church, that cannot be helped, but under all other circumstances decadence in church attendance is the fault either of the church or of the pastor.

Avoid Obsolete Methods

Churches are often cleared of their audiences by the attempt to transplant the modes of the past into the present. The modes and methods of fifty years ago are no more appropriate for to-day than the modes and methods of to-day will be appropriate for fifty years hence. Dr. Kirk, Dr. McElroy, Dr. Mason, Dr. De Witt, Dr. Vermilyea, and hundreds of other men just as good as they were, never lacked audiences, because they were abreast of the time in which they lived. People will not be interested in what we say unless we understand the spirit of the day in which we live. All the woe-begonish statistics are given by those who are trying in our time to work with the worn-out machinery of the past times. Such men might just as well throw the furnaces out of our church basements and substitute the foot-stoves which our grandmothers used to carry with them to meeting, and throw out our organs and our cornets and take the old-fashioned tuning-fork, striking it on the knee and then lifting it to the ear to catch the pitch of the hymn, and might as well throw out our modern platforms and modern pulpits and substitute the wine-glass pulpit up which the minister used to climb to the dizzy height of Mont Blanc solitariness, and then go in out of sight and shut the door after him. When you can get the great masses of the people to take passage from Albany to Buffalo in stage-coach or canal-boat, in preference to the lightning express train which does it in four hours, then you can get the great masses of the people to go to a church half a century behind the time.

The trouble begins away back in the theological seminaries. It is a shame that larger provision is not made for ministers of religion, for the sick and the aged and the infirm who have worn themselves out in the service of God. We have naval asylums and soldiers' asylums for men who fought on land and sea for our country, when these men have become aged or crippled, and it is a shame that larger provision is not made for the good soldiers of Jesus Christ who have worn themselves out in battling for the Lord. But lack of provision in that respect makes a tendency to turn our theological seminaries into a hospital for sick and aged and infirm ministers. When a man begins to go down they give him the title of D.D. by way of resuscitation. If that fails, then the tendency is to elect him to a professorate in some theological seminary. There are grand exceptions to the rule; but it is often the case that the professorate in a theological seminary is occupied by some minister of the Gospel who, not being able to preach himself, is set to teach others how to preach. In more cases than one the poorest speaker in the faculty is the professor of elocution. We want more wide-awake, more able-bodied, able-minded men, more enthusiastic men in our theological seminaries and in the professorates—men like Addison Alexander, who could, during the week, teach young men the theory of preaching, and then, on Sunday, go into the pulpit, and with the thunder and lightning of Christian eloquence show them how. What would you think of a faculty of unsuccessful merchants, to train young merchants, or a faculty of unsuccessful lawyers to train young lawyers? It is often the case that theological seminaries cut a man, and clip him, and square him, and mould him, and bore him, and twist him, until all the individual is gone out of him and he is only a poor copy of a man who was elected to a professorate because he could not preach. We want less dead wood in the theological seminaries, and more flaming evangelists. I declare that a man who cannot preach himself cannot teach others how to preach.

Applied Christianity

At a meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, a clergyman accustomed on the Sabbath to preach to an audience of two or three hundred people, in an audience room that could hold fifteen hundred, was appointed to preach a sermon on how to reach the masses! I am told the incongruity was too much for the risibilities of many of the clergy in the audience. Now a young man coming out from such bedwaring influences, how can he enter into the wants and the woes and the sympathies of people who want, on the Lord's Day, a practical Gospel that will help them all the week and help them forever?

Young ministers are told they must preach Christ and him crucified. Yes, but not as an abstraction. Many a minister has preached Christ and him crucified in such a way that he preached an audience of five hundred down to two hundred, and from two hundred to one hundred, and from one hundred to fifty, and from fifty to twenty, and on down until there was but little left save the sexton, who was paid to stay until the service was over and lock up! There is a great deal of cant about Christ and him crucified. It is not Christ and him crucified as an abstraction, but as an omnipotent sympathy applied to all the wants and woes of our immortal nature—a Christ who will help us in every domestic, social, financial, political, national struggle—a Christ for the parlor, a Christ for the nursery, a Christ for the kitchen, a Christ for the barn, a Christ for the street, a Christ for the store, a Christ for the banking-house, a Christ for the factory, a Christ for the Congressional assembly, a Christ for the court-room, a Christ for every trial and every emergency and every perturbation.

Poor Ministerial Timber

It is often the case that the difficulty begins clear back in the home circle, with misapprehension as to which child ought to be consecrated to the ministry. John is a keen, bright boy. He is good at a bargain. When he trades at school he always gets the best of it. Make him a merchant. He will soon gather a fortune and go right up to take his place among the commercial princes. George has great cerebral development. Phrenologically, language is large. Make him a lawyer. He will argue his way to the front, and he will take his place among the Mansfields and the Storrs. Henry has large girth at the chest, and is military in his step and bearing. Send him to West Point. We shall see him yet a brigadier-general. William is fond of sketching, especially of sketching ships, and he knows as much about a vessel as an old sailor. Make him a shipbuilder. The vessel that he builds will successfully wrestle with the Caribbean whirlwind. Aleck is not very well. He has never had very good digestion. Since that last malarial attack his spleen is enlarged. He has a morbid way of looking at things. He will sit for hours looking at one figure in the carpet. His manners are so mild, so soft, so gentle, so affectionate, so heavenly, and he cries easily. Make him a minister. Now, my friends, that is a great mistake. If you want to consecrate one of your sons to the Gospel ministry, take the one widest awake, the brawniest, the most brilliant, the most irresistible, the most potent. A tremendous work opens before a profession whose one object is to lift the nations toward God, and prepare them for heaven.

Ah! my friends, churches will be largely attended just in proportion as we ministers can meet their wants, meet their sufferings, meet their bereavements, and meet their sympathies. If there be a church with small help, small audience; medium help, medium audience; large help, large audience. If there be a famine, a city, and three depots of bread, and one depot has a hundred loaves, and another depot five hundred loaves, and another depot ten thousand loaves, the depot that has a hundred loaves will have applicants, the depot that has five hundred loaves will have far more applicants, the depot that has ten thousand loaves will have throngs, throngs, throngs.

Ministerial Indolence

Oh, my brethren in the Christian ministry, we somehow get our shoulder under the burden of the people on the Lord's Day, and give them a good stout, and we can do it. We have it all our own way. It is a great pity if, with the floor clear and no interruption, we cannot during the course of an hour get our hands, or our prayer, or our sermon under such momentary can, by the help of God lift the people, body, mind and soul, clear out of their sins, temptations and troubles.

I think that ministerial laziness often empties the church of auditors. Hearers, who are intelligent through reading newspapers and by active association in business circles, will not on the Sabbath sit and listen to platitudes. Hearers will not come to sermons which have in them no important facts, no information, no stirring power, no adaptation, no fire. The pew will not listen to the pulpit unless, at least, on the subject that day under discussion, the pulpit knows more in the pew. Ministerial laziness has cleared out many churches. Such ministers saunter around from parlor to parlor under the name of pastoral visitation, and gadding about through the village or the city on errands of complete nothingness, and wrap their brains around a cigar and smoke them up, and then on Sunday afternoon put a few crude thoughts together, and on Sunday morning wonder that the theme of Christ and him crucified does not bring a large audience, and on Monday sit down and write jeremiads for the religious newspapers about the decadence of church attendance.

People will not go to church merely as a matter of duty. There will not next Sabbath be a thousand people in any city who will get up in the morning and say: "The Bible says I must go to church; it is my duty to go to church, therefore, I will go to church." The multitude of people who go to church, go to church because they like it, and the multitude of people who stay away from church, stay away because they do not like it. I am not speaking about the way the world ought to be, I am speaking about the way the world is. Telling things as they are, we must make the centrifugal force of the church mightier than the centrifugal force. We must make our churches magnets to draw the people thereunto, so that a man will feel uneasy if he does not go to church, saying: "I wish I had gone this morning. I wonder if I can't dress yet and get there in time. It is eleven o'clock; now they are singing. It is half-past eleven; now they are preaching. I wonder when the folks will be home to tell us what was said, what has been going on." When the impressions confirmed that our churches, by architecture, by music, by sociality, and by sermon, shall be made the most attractive places on earth, then we will want twice as many churches as we have now, twice as large, and then they will not half accommodate the people.

More Energy Needed

I say to the young men who are entering the ministry we must put on more force, more energy, and into religious services more vivacity, if we want the people to come. You look into a church court of any denomination of Christians. First, you will find the men large common-sense and earnest look. The education of their minds, the piety of their hearts, the holiness of their lives qualify them for their work. Then you will find in every church court of every denomination group of men who utterly amaze you with the fact that such semi-imbecility can get any pulpits to preach. Those are the men who give forlorn statistics about church decadence. Frogs never croak in running water; always in stagnant. But I say to all Christian workers, to all Sunday School teachers, to all evangelists, to all ministers of the Gospel, if we want our Sunday Schools and our prayer-meetings and our churches to gather the people, we must freshen up. The simple fact is, the people are tired of the humdrum religionists. Religious humdrum is the worst of humdrum. You say over and over again, "Come Jesus," until the phrase means absolutely nothing. Why do you not tell them a story which will make them come to Jesus in five minutes? You say that Sunday School teachers and all evangelists and

A HUDSON VALLEY GOSPEL LIGHTHOUSE

SEVERAL years ago, Gen. A. E. McAlpin, a New York business man of large interests, built for himself and family a neat cottage overlooking the Hudson, in Ossining village. The village contains several foundries and other manufacturing industries, but many of the toilers at these places, with their families, did not avail themselves of the means of grace. It was seen to be an excellent field for a Gospel mission. General McAlpin and family became greatly interested in the evangelistic work of Mr. H. G. Fithians and wife in that neighborhood. As the work grew and a new building became necessary, General McAlpin ordered, at his own expense, the erection of commodious quarters where it could be carried on. He fitted the new building up from cellar to attic with accommodations for daily meetings and a Sunday School, the upper part being used by the missionary and his family as a dwelling. The mission was erected on Broadway not far from the General's home, and is known as "the Gospel Lighthouse." For a number of years, Gospel meetings have been held there nightly, and there is a Sunday School with a regular attendance of several hundred children.

Not only in Ossining village itself, but in any other parts of Westchester county, the influence of this mission has been felt, and many have been led to pure and sober and upright lives.

About three years ago, Mr. Thomas F. Graham, the present missionary, took charge of the work. He is a consecrated, zealous and untiring laborer in the Master's service, and is greatly beloved by the people. Gen. McAlpin and his family continue to be the mainstay of the mission, and maintain the same generous interest in the work that they have shown from the beginning. Out of their own pockets, they pay the salary of the missionary and all other expenses in connection with the Broadway Lighthouse. They also carry on at their own expense an Old Ladies' Home and a Nursery for Sick Children—two beautiful charities. In many other ways, and especially in private charities and kind deeds, they have done much for the poor, the sick and the unfortunate among the villagers.

Last June, a Gospel Tent was erected in the village under the auspices of the mission, and the message of salvation was delivered nightly to hundreds of eager listeners, and many were brought to the Cross.

Could Not Sell His Hopes of Heaven

A foolish young man, boasting of his infidelity, said: "I will sell to anyone all my interest in Christ for five dollars." An old man in the crowd produced five dollars, and a paper on which was written these words, "I hereby, now and forever, sell all my interest in the divine mercy of Jesus Christ, and any hope which I may have of heaven."

"Write your name here," said the old man, "and the money is yours."

The young man took the pen and held it for a few moments over the paper; hesitated, and, turning away, said: "I was mistaken. I cannot afford to do it," he added, emphatically.

The thought uppermost in his mind at that time was, no doubt, the question, "What will become of the soul?" He could not afford to imperil it by a foolish boast.

miners must bring their illustrations from the Bible. Christ did not when he preached. The most of the Bible was written before Christ's time, but where did he get his illustrations? He drew them from the lilies, from the ravens, from salt, from a candle, from a bushel, from long-faced hypocrites, from gnats, from moths, from large gates and small gates, from a camel, from the beetle's eye, from yeast in the dough of bread, from mustard seed, from a fishing-net, from debtors and editors. That is the reason multitudes followed Christ. His illustrations were so easy and so understandable. Therefore, my brother Christian worker, if you find two illustrations for a religious subject, and one is a Bible illustration and the other is outside the Bible, I will take the latter because I want to be like my Master. Looking across to a hill, Christ saw the city of Jerusalem. Talking to the people about the insipidity of Christian example he said, "The world is looking at you; be careful. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." While he was speaking of the divine care of God's children a bird flew past. He said, "Behold the ravens." Then looking down into the valley, covered at that season with flowers, he said, "Consider the lilies." O, my brother Christian workers, what the use of our going away off in some obscure part of history, or on the other side the earth, to get an illustration, when the earth and the heavens are full of illustrations?

Modern Illustrations

Why should we go away off to get an illustration of the various sufferings of Jesus Christ, when at Bloomfield, New Jersey, two little children were walking on the railroad, and a train was coming; but they were on a ridge of trestle-work, and the little girl took her brother and let him down through the trestle-work as gently as she could toward the water, very carefully and lovingly and cautiously, so that he might not be hurt in the fall, and might be picked up by those who were standing near by. While doing that, the train struck her, and hardly enough of her body was left to gather into funeral casket. What was that? Vicarious suffering. Like Christ. Pang for others. Woe for others. Suffering for others. Death for others. What is the use of our going away off to find an illustration in past ages, when in Michigan, a mail-carrier on horseback riding on, pursued by those flames which had swept over a hundred miles, saw an old man by the roadside, dismounted, helped the old man on the horse, saying, "Now whip up and get away." The old man got away, but the mail-carrier perished. Just like Christ dismounting from the glories of heaven to put us on the way of deliverance, then falling back into the flames of sacrifice for others. Pang for others. Woe for others. Death for others. Vicarious suffering. What is the use of our going away off in ancient history to find an illustration of the fact that it is dangerous to defy God, when in the Adirondacks I saw a flash of lightning and bolt so vivid, I said, "That struck something very near." A few hours afterward we found that two farmers that Monday morning had been seated under a tree, the one boasting how that the day before, on the Lord's Day, he had got his hay in, and so cheated the Lord out of that part of the time anyhow, and both of them laughing over the achievement by which they had wronged the Lord of his holy day, when the lightning struck one dead instantly, and the other had been two weeks in bed when we left the Adirondacks, and has become an invalid, I suppose, for life. He did not make as much out of the Lord as he thought he did. Was it any less an illustration for my soul because I met the clergyman on his way home from the funeral, and he told me of the facts, and said the body of the man who had been destroyed was black with the electricity?

Present-Day Examples

O Christian workers, we have got to freshen up. What is the use of our going back in the Christian classics to find an illustration of the victorious Christian death-bed, when my personal friend, Alfred Cookman, a few years ago went away in as imperial grandeur as did Edward Payson. Is it any less an illustration to me and to you because I met him a few weeks before, in front of Trinity Church, Broadway, and I said, "Cookman, you look as if you were working too hard." Where in all the classics is there such a story as that of Cookman, when in his last moment he cried, "I am sweeping through the gates washed in the blood of the Lamb?"

What is the use of going away off to get an illustration, when in a house on Third avenue, Brooklyn, I saw a woman dying, and she said, "Mr. Talmage, heaven used to be to me a great way off, but it now is just at the foot of the bed?" What is the use of your going away off to get illustrations of a victorious death-bed, when all Wales was filled with the story of the dying experience of Frances Ridley Havergal? She got her feet wet standing on the ground preaching temperance and the Gospel to a group of boys and men, went home with a chill, and congestion set in, and they told her she was very dangerously sick. "I thought so," she said, "but it is really too good to be true that I am going. Doctor, do you really think I am going?" "Yes." "To-day?" "Probably." She said, "Beautiful, splendid, to be so near the gate of heaven." Then after a spasm of pain she nestled down in the pillows and said, "There, now, it is all over—blessed rest." Then she tried to sing, and she struck one glad note, high note of praise to Christ, but could sing only one word, "He," and then all was still. She finished it in heaven.

O fellow Christian workers, what is the use of our being stale and obsolete and ancient when all around us are these evidences of God's grace, God's deliverance, God's mercy, and God's wisdom? We have got to freshen up in our sermons, freshen up in our songs, freshen up in our zeal, freshen up in our consecration; and if we do it, my brethren and sisters, we will no more have to coax people to come to church than if you throw corn on the ground you have to coax pigeons to come and eat it; no more than you would have to coax a tired horse to eat the oats you throw in his manger. Yes, we must freshen up in our Sunday Schools, and in our prayer-meetings, and in our pulpits.

It is high time that the Church of God stopped writing apologies for the Church. Let the men who are on the outside, who despise religion, write the apologies. If any people do not want the Church they need not have it. It is a free country. If any man does not want the Gospel he need not have it. It is a free country. But you go out, O people of God, and give the Gospel to the millions of America who do want it. It is high time we stop skirmishing and bring on a general engagement. I want to live to see the Armageddon, all the armies of heaven and hell in battle array, for I know our Conqueror on the white horse will gain the day. Let the Church of God be devoted to nothing else, but go right on to this conquest.

Winged Influences

When Moses with his army was trying to conquer the Ethiopians, profane history says, it was expected that he would go in a roundabout way and come by the banks of the river as other armies had done, because the straight route was infested with snakes, and no army and no man had dared to go across this serpent-infested region. But Moses surprised them. He sent his men out to gather up ibises. The ibis is a bird celebrated for serpent-slaying, and these ibises were gathered into crates and into baskets, and they were carried at the head of the army of Moses, and coming up to the serpent-infested region the crates were opened and the ibises flew forth, and the way was cleared, and the army of Moses marched right on and came so unexpectedly on the Ethiopians that they fled in wild dismay. O Church of God, you are not to march in a roundabout way, but to go straight forward, depending upon winged influences to clear the way. Hosts of the living God, march on, march on! Church attendance, large now, is going to be larger yet. The sky is brightening in every direction. I am glad for the boy and girl five years old: I think they may see the millennium. The wheel of Christian progress has never made one revolution backward. The world moves, the kingdom advances. All nations will yet salute the standards of Prince Immanuel. To him be glory in the Church, throughout all ages. Amen!

Attempted Assassination

AT this present writing the life of our Chief Magistrate is trembling in the balance, and no one but the Lord Almighty knows what will be the result. The most consecrated Christian man who ever sat in the Presidential chair is prostrated by the two bullets of an assassin.

Why should any one want to kill our beloved President? He had nothing but that which he had earned with his own brain and hand. He had fought his own way up from country home to Congressional hall, from Congressional hall to Gubernatorial chair, from Gubernatorial chair to the Presidency. Why should any one try to slay him? He was not a despot who had been treading upon the rights of the people.

There was nothing of the Nero or Robespierre in his nature. He had wronged no man. He was free and happy himself and wanted all the world happy and free. An invalid wife leaned upon his arm and needed his comfort for many years to come. If any one must shoot him, why shoot him then, when he was off for a few days of recreation which he had so dearly earned. How any man could take steady aim at such a good, kind, sympathetic heart, and draw the trigger and see him fall, is inexplicable. But the deed is done. There is a black shadow on every hearthstone in America. It seems as if there were one dead in every house. Again and again, we have prayed, "Father! If it be possible let this cup pass from us." God will hear and answer our prayer if not in one way then in another.

But what an outburst of sympathy glorious and sublime has been called forth by this tragedy. You tell me this is a selfish world, and that it is every man for himself, and that there is no more kindness left. You mistake. At this time throne and cottage, king and schoolboy, parlor and kitchen, Trans-Atlantic and Cis-Atlantic, Trans-Pacific and Cis-Pacific, Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, Jew and Gentile, Eastern Hemisphere and Western Hemisphere have by voice, by pen, by telephone, by telegram, by day, by night poured forth sympathy for our President, his family and the nation. What a man he was, and is! He never did anything more beautifully characteristic than when in his first utterance after he was shot he prayed for his assailant, saying, "May God forgive him!"

God save the President! God save the nation! It is appropriate to make the quotation which James A. Garfield made in an address on Wall street the day after Abraham Lincoln was assassinated: "The Lord reigneth. Clouds and darkness are around about his throne, but righteousness and judgment are the habitation thereof."

There will come good out of this horror, if the Congress of the United States at its second session, will pass a law that will make imprisonment for life the punishment of all Anarchists. The rulers of the earth ought not any longer to be targets for maniac's pistol. These mad dogs must be shut up in a kennel.

The following message was telegraphed to President McKinley by the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on Friday:

LONG BRANCH, Sept. 6.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY, Buffalo, N. Y.

The nation is in prayer for your recovery. You will be nearer and dearer to the people than ever before after you have passed this crisis. Mrs. Talmage joins me in sympathy.

Kindliness

WE cannot afford to be anchorites. There is no such thing as being happy unless we make others happy. I have little patience with people who are never treated well. It is because they do not treat others well. Do you know why people always treat flowers well? It is because flowers always treat us well. Why does the orange blossom kiss the breeze? Because the breeze first kisses the orange blossom. Be kind to others, and others will be kind to you. If you do not find people in your church or neighborhood social, it is because you are not social. There shall not be on our parlor door a bolt of caste. We shall not care about the style of his shoes, if we know that his feet have never walked in polluted places. We shall not care whether the coat is mixed, striped or black, but indignant only if we find out that his heart is as black as his coat. We shall not ask whether his forefather danced with Queen Elizabeth or pounded the shoe-last; whether his blood flowed down to him through the golden pipe of aristocratic ancestry, or whether he got it out of the common puddle from which the most of us picked up our ancestral tablets. We always feel sorry for a man who has so little character himself that he has to go back and marshal a lot of ancestral ghosts to make up the deficiency. Every man must come to be judged by what he himself is worth. I was passing along a piece of low ground and saw two tortoises, a dark-shell and a light-shell turtle. They did not know I was there, and consequently were not interrupted in the conversation. "Get out of the way!" said light-shell tortoise. "Why?" asked dark shell. "Oh," said the light shell, "I am none of your common turtles. Do you see the color of my shell? I was not born like you in this low ground, but up yonder in that higher ditch. My father had the letters G. W. on his back, cut by the jack-knife of George Washington." Then dark tortoise lost his patience and said: "Light tortoise, you had better shut up your shell. The ditch that you were born in was a little higher than mine, but we are both the children of the mud." I threw a stone to break up this war of caste, and instantly light shell and dark shell slunk into the same puddle.

My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons. James 2: 1.

Catholicity

NOTHING during the past summer has more impressed us than the widening brotherhood of Christians. On a thousand platforms, in auditoriums and out-of-door meetings, all denominations have stood side by side. While once in a while there crops out something showing that the bigots are not all dead.

The simple fact is, that there are too many denominations of Christians, the difference between many of them being only imaginary or trivial. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually expended in keeping up the walls, because each sect, however small, must have its secretaries, and its church courts, and its newspaper organs, and its ecclesiastical machinery.

Unless you have investigated for yourself, you have no idea into what a multitude of fragments the church is split. The Baptists are divided into: First, regular; second, Campbellites; third, Dunkers; fourth, Free Will; fifth, Anti-Mission; sixth, Winnebrennarian; seventh, Seventh Day; eighth, Six Principle; ninth, General; tenth, Mennonites.

The Methodist Church is divided into: First, Methodist Episcopal Church North; second, Methodist Episcopal Church South; third, African Methodist Episcopal Church; fourth, Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; fifth, Colored Methodist Church; sixth, African Methodist Church; seventh, Union American Methodist Episcopal Church; eighth, Congregational Methodist; ninth, Primitive Methodists; tenth, Independent Methodists; eleventh, Free Methodists; twelfth, Welsh Calvinistic Methodists; thirteenth, Wesleyan, Methodist connection; fourteenth, Methodist Evangelical Association; fifteenth, Methodist Protestant; sixteenth, United Brethren in Christ. The Adventists are divided into: First, Second Adventists; second, Seventh Day Adventists; third, Evangelical Adventists; fourth, Non-Resurrection Adventists; fifth, Age-to-come Adventists. The Quakers are divided into: First, Orthodox; second, Hicksite; third, Wilbur, or Friends on Original Principles; fourth, Kingsites; fifth, Lambornites; sixth, Progressives. The Presbyterians are divided into the Northern Presbyterians, Southern Presbyterians, Cumberland Presbyterians, United Presbyterians, Reformed Presbyterians, Associate Reformed Presbyterians, and many other denominations more in number than we have mentioned, are more or less absurdly cut up into a great ecclesiastical shambles with enough salt of real grace in each to keep it and enough pepper of biting controversy to spice it, but nevertheless hash. With some it is a question of robes; with some a question of days; with some a question about non-essentials so small that the theologian has to get out his dictionary to find them.

The mere recital of their names shows the necessity that something be done for their combination. The world is ever taken for God, and its sins overthrow it, it will be by the marching of all the hosts of God in did column to attack. The sixteen kinds of Methodists will come under one wing, the ten kinds of Baptists must come under another wing, and the seven kinds of Presbyterians under still another wing. After all the branches of each denomination have united, the greatest denominations nearest akin will unite, and his absorption shall go on until there shall be one great Millennial Church, divided only for convenience into geographical section, and as of old it was the "Church of Laodicea," and the "Church of Philadelphia," and the "Church of Thyatira," so it shall be the "Church of America," and the "Church of Europe," and the "Church of Asia," and the "Church of Africa," and the "Church of Australia." In that World-wide Church there will be only one article of creed—Christ first, Christ last, and Christ forever.

As the body is one, and hath many members, and the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ. I. Cor. 12: 12.

Healthy Eating

WHILE seated, about a year ago, in the dining-room of the late John Ruskin, we saw an unusual number of windows, and we bethought ourselves of the importance of having plenty of light, and of cheer in the rooms where we eat. The dining-room is about the only place where the family all meet. It is not more what you have on the table than what you talk about and see. Men would live ten years longer if, instead of choking down greasy potatoes and tinned meat at the public restaurant, they would always go home and dine. It seems to me that all clerks and merchants ought to have one hour in the middle of the day for this reconstruction of the physical strength. For the lack of this, many of the men I know go to bed at afternoon with an awful bad feeling at the pit of their stomach. The food they eat has no time to assimilate, and the meat taken, instead of turning into manure, remains what it originally was, so that in his aged digestive organs the lamb and the cow lie down together, and get up just as they have a mind to. From one to two o'clock the digestive organs are crying out, "Man alive! Give us time. What on earth do you expect us to do with these unmatricated pickles? If possible come home at noon and then take time to eat. If you carve, feel the responsibility resting on you. You can you insult your wife by throwing at her a chunk of meat, and firing off a potato at her plate, and serving the bread-basket around in such swift circuit as to leave the table that your children, with one wild clutch, dip at it, knowing it is their last chance. There is such a thing as unhealthy eating.

For this cause many are weak and sickly among you. I. Cor. 11: 30.

Sankey's First Convert

The hymn commencing "I am so glad that our Father in Heaven," has a beautiful story connected with it. Mr. Sankey had sung the chorus of another hymn, "Oh, how I love Jesus," when he said: "I have sung long enough about my poor love to Christ, and now I will sing of his love to me." With this thought in his mind, he wrote the hymn. Mr. Sankey says that a little girl, who was dying, bore beautiful testimony to the power of the hymn. "Don't you remember, one Tuesday," she said, "when you were teaching us to sing 'I am so glad that Jesus loves me,' you told us that, if we gave our hearts to Jesus, we should feel and know his love? And I gave my heart to him." Mr. Sankey says: "What that dying girl said helped to cheer me more than anything I had done before, for she was my first convert."

Solomon's Pools in Use

ABLE despatches from the East, published last week, report an interesting engineering work. The Turkish Governor of Jerusalem, Mohammed Djavad Pasha, has ordered that a connection be made between the city and the pools of Solomon in order to supply the citizens with water. The old aqueduct is to be repaired and a pipe laid from the pools to Jerusalem. The pools are great reservoirs lying in the ravine between Bethlehem and Hebron, about nine miles south of Jerusalem. They are three in number, and are fed by living springs over which is the building referred to in Canticles (4: 12) as a sealed fountain. The largest pool is 582 feet long, 207 feet wide and fifty feet deep. The pool drains into another and each is lined with cement. It is said that Solomon constructed the reservoirs to water his gardens, but the water appears ultimately to have been carried to Jerusalem. The aqueducts, however, are now decayed and the citizens have been compelled to rely mainly on the rainfall, which this year has proved inadequate. The Pasha, therefore, has obtained the Sultan's permission to lay a pipe to these old reservoirs, in which there is an abundant supply of water drained from the hills. It is significant that a work which was constructed nearly three thousand years ago, should be utilized for the benefit of the city over which its constructor reigned in central magnificence. Would that the people could be induced to see their spiritual thirst with that water which is offered by One greater than Solomon!

Whoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life (John 4: 14).

Caught by Barnacle

SOME fishermen from Sten Island, N. Y., made a curious capture last week. They went out in their sloop for a day's fishing. In the course of the day one of them found a heavy weight on his line. Thinking it had caught a water-soaked log he tried to get it loose. To his astonishment, however, he discovered that it was a turtle that had taken the bait. One of the men came to his assistance, and, finding the character of the haul, went for the boat-hook. Even then there seemed little chance of getting the big creature on board; but at last the boat-hook caught, and the turtle was drawn in. The creature was in a fury, and fought as struggled viciously to get away, but it was finally secured with a rope and put in the cock-pit. It was found that the capture was due to the barnacles that had grown on its shell. It was under one of the barnacles that the boat-hook had caught, and it held until the creature was drawn in. There is reason to fear that men are sometimes captured and perish in a similar way. Laziness and self-indulgence lead to a condition in which temptation finds it easy to get a fatal hold on even a strong man. It is only those who follow closely in the Master's footsteps who can say with him:

Prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in me (John 14: 9).

Family Wedding Party

A wedding took place in Boston, Mass., on Sept. 3, which was unique in the assistance given by relatives at college fraternities. The bridegroom, who is an Aherst graduate of 1888, the officiating clergyman, the best man, and the chief usher were brothers, and the bride, bridesmaids, and organist were Mount Holyoke graduates. The chapel was decorated in golden-rod and green, by the graduate members of Psi Omega of Mount Holyoke College, of which fraternity the bride is a member. The bride has been a teacher in a high school of Easthampton, Mass., and Rockville, Conn., since her graduation at Mount Holyoke in 1898. The bridegroom has been since 1894 pastor of St. Paul's Congregational Church of Nutley, N. J., where the newly-married couple will be at home after Oct. 1. It must have been very pleasant to the young people to have been surrounded at the ceremony which united them, by representatives of their family and educational life. It would be well if in that union with Christ, of which marriage is a type, there were always such associations, which would imply a consecration of all the relations of social life.

That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another (I. Cor. 12: 25).

Swindling in the Gold Fields

A number of complaints have reached the authorities from persons in the neighborhood of the Klondike and in several districts of Alaska, of having been swindled by crooks. Their stories are very much alike. They were visited by one or sometimes two men in the garb of miners, who said that they were obliged to return to their homes in the East, and needed money for expenses. They offered gold dust or small nuggets at a reduction on the regular rate. The unfortunate purchasers found, when the gold was assayed, that the nuggets were base metal, thinly washed with gold, and that the dust was largely brass filings. One would have thought that the dilemma was solved at last by his consenting to be chloroformed. A doctor in the party fortunately had the materials in his pocket-case, and the young man was put under the influence of the drug and was carried on an improvised litter down the two miles of the trail which he most dreaded. Then a rest was taken while he recovered nerve sufficient to finish the journey on a burro. Evidently it was not fear of the precipices which tormented him, for he would know that he could not escape them by being chloroformed, but would rather increase the danger. It was fear of his own impulses and consciousness of his lack of self-control in the presence of danger, which influenced him. It is much to be wished that when men contemplate taking the downward moral path, they had a like fear; but they usually take the opposite attitude, having abundant confidence in their own self-control.

Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall (I. Cor. 10: 12).

A Remarkable Operation

The surgeons of the J. Hood Wright Memorial Hospital, in New York, performed a critical operation on a patient, a few days ago. He had fallen off a surface car, and had been brought to the hospital in a serious condition. The whole of his right side was paralyzed, he had lost the use of his vocal organs, and was in a comatose state. After being in the hospital ten days, without improvement, the surgeons had a consultation at which they decided that the only way to save the patient's life was to remove a portion of his skull and take away a clot of blood, which, as they believed, was pressing on his brain. There were no marks on the patient's head indicating injury, but when the piece of skull was lifted, the clot was found under it, in the exact spot expected by the surgeons. When it was removed and the patient recovered from the effects of the ether, he was able to talk and had the free use of his paralyzed limbs. He was so much better the next day that his complete restoration is now confidently expected. In times past, or in less skilful hands, the treatment would probably have been applied to the limbs which were affected, not to the head, which did not show signs of injury. The result, however, shows that the surgeons were right in dealing with the cause, the existence of which they inferred from its effects. The same method applies to spiritual maladies. Mere reformation of conduct does not save, unless the heart from which sin proceeds, is renewed by God's grace.

For from within, out of the heart of man, proceed evil thoughts. (Mark 7: 21).

BRIEF NOTES

Announcement is made of the death of Dr. William H. De Puy, formerly associate editor of the Christian Advocate, of New York, and the author of well-known text-books. Dr. De Puy was eighty years of age and had been nearly sixty years in the ministry.

A press despatch from New Haven, Conn., announces that the Church Army headquarters that has been in existence in that city for five years, being mainly supported by leading members of the Episcopal Church, is to be abandoned in a few days and will go out of existence altogether. The officer in charge said that the place was to be closed because aid was lacking.

A distressing cable message comes from Constantinople. It briefly states that brigands have captured Miss Ellen M. Stone, one of the missionaries of the American Board, in the district of Djumabala, in the Vilayet of Salonica. It is probable that they are holding her for ransom. Our Government has been notified and every effort will be made to obtain her release.

Rev. H. C. Minton, Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, is quoted as saying in a recent sermon on the Revision of the Creed: "We hear talk of old-time ideas, of worn-out notions and threadbare creeds, but I tell you that the change is not in the truth, you may be sure. The system has not changed one iota if men's conception of it has. Men may misapprehend, but that does not affect the truth, it simply affects the misapprehender."

The plans accepted for the new Y. M. C. A. building at Dayton, O., call for one of the finest edifices of this class in the country. The estimated cost, including furnishing, is $350,000. It will contain an auditorium seating two thousand persons and three hundred on the stage; the assembly hall and parlors will seat three hundred at tables.

land of gold was the last place in the world where spurious gold would be sold, but it was precisely that fact which led the swindlers to operate there, where people would not be on their guard. The church of Christ has often suffered through similar deception. In those places where genuine Christians have won the respect and confidence of the public, the hypocrite finds it most easy to make dupes:

Who swear by the name of the Lord and make mention of the God of Israel, but not in truth nor in righteousness; for they call themselves of the holy city and stay themselves upon the God of Israel (Isaiah 65: 1).

Chloroforming a Mountaineer

A singular experience befell a young scientist during his summer vacation. The Call, of San Francisco, Calif., says that among a party who set out to climb Mount Wilson, was a learned graduate of an Eastern University. On the way up, the young man was seized with the peculiar dizziness which the rarified air of great altitudes produces on delicately organized temperaments. As the trail wound toward the summit and he saw the abyss yawning below him, he began to experience that strange phenomenon of the mind which frequently lays hold of those who stand on dizzy precipices, impelling them to fling themselves into the depths beneath. Pursued by this terrible desire, he clung with might and main to his burro, and was carried the two remaining miles into camp by the sure-footed beast, suffering the while all the mental torture and agonies of which an imaginative mind is capable. Once on the plateau, he resolutely refused to descend. It would, he said, be certain death. Never again would he go through such sensations as he bore in the ascent. Yet he knew he could not stay there always. The

BEGINNINGS OF THE LIFE OF FAITH

Quarterly Review of International S. S. Lessons, Sept. 29

GOLDEN TEXT:—The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him. Ps 103: 17

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

A GREAT king gave to each of his subjects a pocket-book in which only one dollar could be seen at a time, the remainder being hidden until that was spent, and the amount in reserve being unknown to the receiver. But every man knew, though he often seemed to forget it in spendthrift moments, that the amount given him could not be increased, and that what he spent would never be replaced. He was that much poorer, unless he had secured in return for the expenditure some other form of enrichment, in fair exchange. We have spent ninety-one dollars out of this pocket-book since we began this quarter's lessons, ninety one of the days God gives to each of us, of which only one is in sight at a time, and the number in reserve wholly unknown. But we do know each night that we have one day less to live, and that we are one day poorer, unless we have so expended the day as to enrich ourselves in Christian manhood and the world in useful service.

Let us review not alone the few hours of the quarter given to these lessons, not alone its "Lord's Days," but all the days and hours of this new "year of our Lord," this new Christian century. Are we making it a "year of our Lord," a "Christian century" thus far in our own "eternal life?" The eternities, the centuries, the years will take care of themselves if we take care of the days, the hours, the moments.

"So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

We should fill all the hours with the sweetest things, if we had but a day. Every moment, Lord, I need The merit of thy death.

Even a single day would be seen to be a boundless miracle, if we would only think. We can live it but once, and should live it to the uttermost of blessings.

Oh, day, if I squander a wavelet of thee,
A mite of thy twelve hours' treasure,
The least of thy gazes or glances,
Be they grants thou art bound to or gifts above measure,
One of thy choices or one of thy chances,
Be they tasks God imposed thee or freaks at thy pleasure,
My day, if I squander such labor or leisure,
The shame fall on Asolo, mischief on me!

ROBERT BROWNING, Pippa Passes.

Each hour a sentence, and each year a chapter,
Such is the book of life, in sequence clear.
Earth fills a volume, heaven, ah! how many?
But all one story, written there or here.
Strive, then, O friend, the best in thee to say
For that divine review beyond to-day!

"Inasmuch as the Quarterly Review is always our hardest lesson," said the Superintendent, "and is therefore often omitted in September for the generalities of a 'Rally Day,' of which a good review should be the best part, I have asked you, teachers, to come together a whole week beforehand to compare review plans, that we may not waste review day, but expend it so as to enrich our own life of faith, and kindle that life in others. In opening the review, as Superintendent, I shall impress upon all hearts by allegory and questions above

One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my home to-day
Than I have been before.

"I shall then speak a word of the Bible as a whole, inasmuch, as in this quarter, we are once more beginning its study at a time when new attacks are being made upon it."

In the papers much is being said of King Alfred the Great, of England, the thousandth anniversary of whose birth is about to be celebrated, which will suggest to alert teachers in all kinds of schools to make much of the history of this favorite hero of old and young. He translated the Ten Commandments, the corner-stone of British law, as Justinian and Charlemagne had made them corner-stones of all Christendom; and Alfred carried the Psalms also wherever he went, and made the Decalogue and Psalter the standards of his personal life.

One of the last acts of our last Congress was to establish a "National Bureau of Standards" in connection with the Treasury Department. It is to have charge of the testing apparatus for measuring, and of comparing standards in use in commerce, manufactures and science, with those recognized by the Government. The Bible is a world bureau of standards, but we need to remember that the standard of manhood it presents is Jesus Christ, not Noah, or Abraham, or any other imperfect man. Those noble but erring patriarchs are presented to show the beginnings of the life of faith, the first victories "by Faith," the invisible conqueror whose triumphal arch is Hebrews 11, and who never met a Waterloo.

All these battles of faith belong to that divine proposal, "Let us make man." The creation of manhood is still going on, and we can all see it is only fairly begun in ourselves, and even in the best men, the Abrahams of the past, and even in the saints of the present. But our quarter's lessons show that man becomes manly in proportion as he becomes godly, that is, God-like, by receiving God into his soul. Faith is friendship. To make every man, as Abraham was, "the friend of God," and by this fellowship God-like, God-filled, is creation's yet unfinished work.

THE OBEDIENCE OF ABRAHAM

THE FATHER OF THE FAITHFUL

MEETING OF JACOB AND ESAU

There is an Oriental legend which tells effectively how Abraham smashed the visible idols of his time, the outward worship of which men substituted for fellowship with the such as that!" The old man blushed crimson from shame and left without making a purchase. Soon afterwards came a serious-looking female, bringing an offering to the gods. "Give it them thyself, and thou wilt see how greatly they eat it," said Abraham. She did so and departed. Abraham then took a hammer and broke in pieces all the idols except the largest, and into the hand of that one introduced the hammer. When Terah came home he was surprised to see the damage done to his property, and asked, "What profane wretch has dared to abuse the gods?" Abraham replied: "During thine absence a woman brought yonder food to the gods, and the younger ones began to eat it. The old god thereupon grew enraged at their boldness, and seizing the hammer, smashed them." "Dost thou think thine aged father?" said Terah. "Do I not know that thou neither eat nor move?" "And yet," answered Abraham, "on dost worship them, and would have me worship them, too."

"You have outlined the review as an expanded creation of man," said Dr. Brown, the class teacher. "I propose to select as the one thread I can follow through these lessons, the so-called purple Christ thread, the lining of the revelation of Christ, who brings God to man, and man to God, and with reference to the very same subject you have in view, the development of manhood. Man created with capacity to image God realizes at image through beholding Christ, not by imitation but by imagination. Beholding in Christ the glory of the Lord was changed into the same image in character to imitate."

1. Colossians, Hebrews, and the Gospel of John all teach that Christ made the world. "Without him was not anything made that has been made." (John 1:14; Heb. 1:2).

2. At the very hour of the fall, Christ was foretold as a bruised conqueror, the seed of the woman who shall bruise the serpent's head at the cost of his own bruising.

3. Abel "by faith" beheld dimly on his altar the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.

4. The ark at least illustrates the provision made in Christ for all who will to escape the deserved and certain punishment of sin. "Come thou and all thy house into the ark."

5. By Abraham, as also by Jacob later, "the Lord" is seen, who must therefore have been the Son, whose Old Testament visits to man in human form prepared the way for his longer visit in New Testament days. Note that he showed the same blending of justice and mercy in his early visits as in the later one.

6. The sacrifice of Isaac was clearly an acted parable in which Abraham dimly "saw Christ's day" (John 8:56), when God "spared not his own Son but freely gave him up for us."

7. Jacob beheld the visible Jehovah-Jesus, not only at the front steps to the door of heaven at Bethel but also the daybreak at Peniel, and found in him transformation of character.

"In my class of young men," said Miss Franks, "I seek to arouse strong resolves that they will be the Abrahams of these times. Everyone is destined to be an Abraham, an Isaac, a Jacob, or an Esau. Those four types almost cover the census in all countries. Human nature is very much alike in all ages. Everywhere we go we find a few heroic, progressive Abrahams, who smash idols, and start new movements, and 'hitch their wagon to a star.' They look beyond what is seen into the unseen world and count it the most real and important. They believe God made them to bless and brighten the world, and imperfectly they seek to do it. We cannot all be as great as Abraham, but we can all be as good for our times as he was for his. When we read his faults, let us remember that he dared to be better than the people he lived with. Do we? Some gentle, retiring spirits it may not be worth while to urge on to be Abrahams. They can bless the world as gentlemen of the sort that Isaac was. To such may be offered an ideal Dr. Henry Van Dyke's Pathway of Peace.

"To be glad of life, because it gives you the chance to love and to work, and to play, and to look up at the stars; to be satisfied with your possessions, but not contented with yourself until you have made the best of them; to despise nothing in the world except falsehood and meanness, and to do nothing except cowardice; to be governed by your admissions rather than by your disgusts; to covet nothing that your neighbor's, except his kindness of heart and gentleness of manners; to think seldom of your enemies, often of your friends, and ever of Christ—these are the little guide-posts on the foot-path to peace."

INDIA'S FIRST
COLLEGE

THE cablegram received at the M. E. Mission Rooms, 150 Fifth avenue, New York, Sept. 3, announcing the death in Lucknow, India, of Miss Isabella Thoburn, the noted missionary, called wide and profound regret. Miss Thoburn was a pioneer in the Master's work in India, where she has labored for over thirty years. Her name is a household word in any a zenana there as at thousands of earthstones here. The Girls' High School at Lucknow and the beautiful Woman's College in that city are monuments to her genius and devotion. Her college is the first woman's college in India. Its influence is widespread, and its benefits are undenominational.

It was on Nov. 3, 1899, that Miss Thoburn sailed for India, the first woman chosen to be sent out by the newly organized Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. Church. From that day to the hour of her death, her talents and energies were freely and faithfully spent in striving to bring India to Christ. During her long service, which measured the life of the W. F. M. S., she had but three vacations; the first was in 1880; the second in 1886, she improved by engaging in the Deacons' movement, then in its infancy. Her recent visit to this country was for the purpose of raising the endowment fund for the Woman's College; and it was also to serve as delegate to the Ecumenical Council, of which she was one of the most interesting personalities. With her was Miss Liliati Singh, B. A., a brilliant young Hindu graduate of Calcutta University, for which she had been prepared by Miss Thoburn; she is at present a teacher in the Woman's College. This last visit of the missionary to her native land was so full of activity that it can hardly be described as a vacation.

Miss Thoburn was born March 29, 1847, near St. Clairsville, O. Of Scotch ancestry, she possessed many of the characteristics of that sturdy and noble race. Her childhood was surrounded by religious influences, and before it was a popular thing for a girl to be given academic training, she early decided that this was her rightful inheritance, and attended the Female College at Wheeling, Va., where she was graduated. She afterwards spent a year in the school of Design in Cincinnati. While engaged in teaching she was meeting her work in life, and wrote to the Secretary of the General Missionary Society for a place in the foreign field; to be told there was nothing a single woman could do. She then applied to the Union Missionary Society and began correspondence with Mrs. Doremus, President of that pioneer organization, which is the "mother of all the women's missionary societies," when the M. E. Woman's Foreign Missionary Society was formed; and the young Methodist was sent out by that body on "large faith, wit to money, and in fact with no (visible treasury)." With her went Dr. Clara A. Swain, the second missionary chosen by the W. F. M. S., and the first medical woman missionary ever sent abroad, who established at Meerut the first Woman's Hospital of the Orient, on property generously given by a young Mohammedan prince, who appreciated the need of his countrymen for such an institution.

Mrs. Daggett's Historical Sketches of Woman's Missionary Societies, published in 1883, in giving the Christian girls. She had eight pupils. Quickly the work enlarged, including middle-aged women and little children, and taking on both kindergarten and academic features, and developing as it did so, into a boarding school, where native girls could find the protection and advantages of a Christian home-life while availing themselves of educational opportunities. Its influence radiated further than Lucknow, and in its hospitable shelter Christian visitors to India often found rest and refreshment.

The call for a collegiate department came in 1886, from a student of the High School, who wished to study medicine, and who, in order that she might thereby add to her efficiency and her standing, desired to take a university course and degree. But one school in India could give her this preparation, and that was non-Christian and with strong Brahmin sympathies. In 1887, the Woman's College was founded, with only three students. Others came; excellent work was done, and the institution affiliated with Calcutta University, under the cordial sanction of Lord Dufferin, then Viceroy; since which the University examinations and degrees have been open to students of the Woman's College. Women, who began as little girls, their education under Miss Thoburn, are now teachers, pastors' wives, zenana workers and Bible readers; many others, as Christian wives and mothers, are bringing Mohammedan and Hindu homes to know the beauty of Christian living.

Miss Thoburn organized and put in operation various schools besides the one which grew into the Woman's College. She was, particularly during earlier years in India, actively engaged in zenana visitation, seeing many native women in their homes. In Sunday School work, her labors were invaluable. Indeed, the name of her who has just died is worthy to stand beside that of her distinguished brother, Rev. J. M. Thoburn, Bishop of India, whose help she was in every way. They counseled together, and she was as the Bishop's right hand. As readers of this paper know, Bishop Thoburn was Chairman of the Interdenominational Missionary Relief Committee during the famine of 1897-99, and administered in that capacity the funds received from this country. In this work of feeding the starving people of India, Miss Thoburn was deeply interested.

Now that she has passed away, her educational work will doubtless be taken up as a doubly sacred trust by those on whom her mantle falls. The future of India's first Woman's College should be secured. A woman who has done so much in such noble causes deserves a lasting monument. What more fitting tribute could be paid to her memory.

than the raising for the Woman's College of the full endowment for which she labored so earnestly. What she hath done in the name of the Master is sure to live after her in the hearts of the women and children of India; and "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord" may be truly said of her who so lately joined the hosts of the Lord's servants in that far country, which is the Christian's true home.

THE LATE MISS ISABELLA THOBURN

story of the M. E. W. F. M. S., says: "Fourteen years have passed, and Isabella Thoburn, in Lucknow, is still the strength and crown of our missionary force." This was true of her to the last. She died of cholera, and in more ways than one it may be said of her, she gave her life for India.

It was in April, 1870, that Miss Thoburn opened in a little room, in a bazar in Lucknow, her school for

Shansi Famine Cloud Lifting

... But Great Suffering
Still Reported in Shensi

AFTER weeks of waiting, the letters from Shansi, the heart of the Chinese famine district, have come to hand, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now enabled to lay before its readers the first detailed reports that have been received from the famine field. These letters were mentioned in a recent cablegram from Chairman Arthur Smith, of the Famine Relief Committee. In forwarding the reports from Shansi, Chairman Smith now writes from Chefoo, under date August 5, as follows:

I enclose herewith the latest word which has just come to me from Shansi, which will tell you all I know about what is doing in the actual work of relief. The funeral of thirty-four Protestant martyrs was held in considerable state July 18th, at different points, one pavilion being in the yamen of the Prefect, and another outside that of the Governor of the province, within which these were all killed last year. There was a long procession, which took an hour and a half to get to the newly-made cemetery, two miles outside the city on the hills, where the main services were held, and where an address, specially written by the Governor himself, was read by an official appointed for this purpose. There was an escort of a hundred Chinese foot-soldiers, thirty cavalry, and numerous civil officials, and everything was done in accordance with the prearranged programme. Externally, Shansi is quiet, but it is by no means certain, or, as some think, even probable, that the seeds which brought forth such a harvest of ruin a year ago, will not yet have a new vitality under changed conditions.

I have just received a telegram from Shansi, which was seven days on the way (dated the 17th, received the 24th), saying that there is no further need of famine relief there, and suggesting that any other moneys be sent to Hankow, care of Rev. M. B. Duncan for use, according to his opportunities, in Shensi. I at once made the necessary arrangements with the bank here, and sent Tls. 13,000,000, the most of the balance on hand. This I cabled to you, as also the intelligence that 700 a day were dying at Si Ngan Fu. In case there is more money sent for Shensi, it will save trouble and expense to forward directly to the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank at Hankow, for Mr. Duncan's use. Within a few days I have word of famine in the southern part of this province, but we have forwarded the most of the funds to the west. Tls. 2,000 of the amount set apart for Chihli, but uncalled for, was sent by Mr. Allen to Shansi, with the Tls. 15,000 of which I send you word. I am just leaving for Chefoo on account of ill-health. ARTHUR H. SMITH.

The accompanying letter from Dr. I. J. Atwood explains itself. I will forward anything which reaches me. Yet, since the distributors are all busy men with multitudinous cares, you will understand that their reports cannot be like those of a numerous and well-equipped committee. The good already done, according to Dr. Atwood's report, is very encouraging. I am trying to find out by what means another Tls. 10,000 can be forwarded perhaps by native drafts through Hankow. ARTHUR H. SMITH.

The letters from Shansi are given below:

TAI YUEN FU, SHANSI,
July 12, 1901.

MY DEAR DR. SMITH: Shen Taotai has just called to bring me your telegram announcing the second gift of 20,000 gold dollars from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD subscription fund. He also brings a message from the Governor to "thank the Christian people of America and Mr. Talmage for their generous gifts, and wishes them to know that he has ordered proclamations posted in all the places where the missionary peace commission proceeds, to show the ignorant people of Shansi the difference between their treatment of the native Christians, and the treatment of American Christians of them."

The Lord has prepared the way before us in a wonderful manner. Yesterday, reports from Shensi came in with some Christians, who report that many thousands of poor people had died of starvation. The crops about here never looked more promising since I came to Shansi. While we were delayed at Shou Yang it rained nearly all day. A helper said that they had not had such a rain for two years. The poppy and wheat flourish side by side, and the opium capsules are very rank and large. There has certainly been much suffering among the despoiled Christians and beggars. Eight hundred taels were distributed at Tai Ku and eight hundred taels at Fen Cho Fu, and chapels have been rented at both places and services held. There seems now no insuperable obstacle to the settlement of the unfortunate troubles at either place, so that the work may go on there in native hands. Although our best and trusted men are nearly gone, the Lord will raise up whom it pleases him to carry on the work they loved and labored for.

I. J. ATWOOD.

In a second letter dated Tai Yuen Fu, Shansi, July 22, Mr. Atwood writes to Chairman Smith:

I sent you a telegram last week saying that there was no further need of funds for famine relief in this province, and that the need was still reported great at Sian Fu. While there is some hard times in the south of this province, the crops are good throughout and prices have already fallen to moderation. The sum brought to Shansi has been divided into two parts, one to go south of the Ling Shih pass and the other north. I have turned over Tls. 300 to the English Baptists, to account for the amount used by our Christians in Tai Ku, Fen Cho Fu and Ching Yuen. I expect to go to Tai Ku to-day. Duncan will

FRANCIS H. NICHOLS

MR. FRANCIS H. NICHOLS, who goes to China as the correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having been commissioned to visit the famine field and to record his impressions and observations for the information of American readers, is a young journalist who has already seen much active service at home and abroad. During the Spanish-American War, he was in Cuba as the correspondent of the New York Herald, and he carried the declaration of war to Maximilian Gomez in his camp at Juanabonito. He was an eye-witness of the famous battle of San Juan Hill. Afterwards, on the correspondents' staff of the New York Herald, he was on the first boat which entered Havana after the signing of the peace protocol. Mr. Nichols is now attached to the New York Herald and Express. In addition to newspaper work, he has been a frequent contributor to the leading magazines. His letters from the field will be unusually valuable and interesting.

go to Sin Cho as soon as he is well enough to leave; and on his return leave for the south and Sian Fu (in Shensi). I asked to have famine funds sent to his address at Han Kow, whence he can draw from Sian Fu. The Governor and Shen Tun Ho seem to be both energetic and sagacious officials, and are succeeding well so far in settling up affairs in the province very satisfactorily.

I. J. ATWOOD.

Mr. Edwards writes from Tai Yuen Fu, Shansi, to Mr. Arthur Smith, under date of July 22:

With regard to the famine money, we formed a local committee here, and having ascertained that the distress was more severe in the Southern part of the province, we allotted Tls. 5,800 to our China Inland Mission friends to distribute, for which I enclose their receipt, as I think it will be safer in your hands than mine. We do not now hear of much real distress in this neighborhood or northwards, though only to-day one of our members has told me of a village in the mountains where the pinch is severely felt. I hope to send help there. It is in these mountain villages where there is real need, but they are difficult of access and almost impossible to relieve with our present limited staff. The Fu-stai was very pleased to hear of the help we had brought and of the other $20,000 which you had received, and has issued a very good proclamation.

Everything is outwardly quiet here, and we go about the city quite freely without escort of any kind; but all foreigners going any distance are escorted by a wei-yuen.

E. H. EDWARDS.

From Paoting Fu, Chihli, July 15, Mr. Edgar Allen Pierce writes to Dr. Lowry: I hear here there is famine in the south of Chihli, near Honan boundary. The director of the railway says they are eating leaves there. No letters from Sian-fu have yet been received.

While engaged in the work of famine relief, the Committee were confronted by a new calamity—the inundation of the Yangtze Valley, accompanied by widespread destruction of life and property. With the recession of the flood, the extent of this disaster became apparent. Thousands had perished, and a great multitude were homeless and helpless. So many appeals were made to the Committee that Chairman Smith sent this cablegram to Dr. Klopsch:

CHEFOO, Sept. 3.

KLOPSCH, New York.

Terrible Yangtze floods. Dr. Richard and others approve appointing Shanghai Committee of Chinese and foreigners, embracing consuls, merchants, missionaries, distribute relief. If funds not all required in Shensi, then transfer to Yangtze.

(Signed) SMITH.

A second cablegram, received several hours later, showed the urgency of the situation. It was as follows:

CHEFOO, Sept. 3.

KLOPSCH, New York:

Dr. Duncan wires one-third population dead. Shanghai forming Yangtze Relief Committee. (Signed) SMITH.

In response, Dr. Klopsch cabled to Chairman Smith, approving the action of the Committee in responding to the urgent demands of the flood survivors for help. Under the terms of its appointment, the Committee has full power to extend relief operations, and it will doubtless do so in that part of the province of Keangsu, where the flood has wrought general havoc, and, according to the report, drowned half the population along the valley of the river.

The Famine in Shensi

In a newspaper despatch from Tai Yuen Fu (forwarded by Chairman Smith), there is late news from Shensi. This apparently does not come through missionary sources. The despatch says:

Within the city there are some thirty-two kitchens constantly preparing millet gruel for the starving, yet over seven hundred are said to be dying each day. The Empress Dowager is said to be so anxious that relief be honestly administered that she has beheaded two officials who were found guilty of dishonesty. She is exceedingly popular with the people, because the presence of the Court has compelled the abolition of the restriction that grain cannot be imported from another province. Rice is therefore being bought in Honan, Hupei and Szechuan. Although the price is ten times the normal value, the supply is fairly regular. Rain has fallen, but not 20 per cent. of the land has been sown, as there are so few animals, and seed could not be bought. That means a continuation of the destitution till the spring of 1902—a very serious thing for the people in view of the winter's cold. Famine fever is also raging and claiming its victims. Wolves, as in every famine, are prowling around with fearless ferocity, and devouring both young and old. Altogether the condition of the province of Shensi can be more readily imagined than described.

PASTY FOOD.

Too Commonly Used.

The use of pasty cereals is not advisable. A physician says, "Pasty cereals are very indigestible and a bad thing for the stomach, causing a depressed feeling and quite a train of disorders, particularly of the intestines and nerves."

Cereals, such as wheat and oats, can be cooked long enough and well enough to fit them for human use, but the ordinary way of cooking leaves them in a pasty condition.

A gentleman from Evansville, Ind., whose name can be secured upon application to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., says: "My physician prohibited the use of oats and wheat, for I was in a bad condition physically, with pronounced dyspepsia. He said the heavy paste was indigestible, but that Grape-Nuts, being a thoroughly cooked food and cooked in such a manner as to change the starch into grape-sugar, could be easily digested. I have become very fond indeed of Grape-Nuts and all the uncomfortable feelings have disappeared. I have gained nearly twelve pounds in weight and none of the distressed, full feeling after my meals that I had formerly. Grape-Nuts Food has done the work."

Three Beautiful Testimonies

Mrs. Beauchamp, Mrs. Clinton Smith, and Mrs.
Sangster Tell How they Became Christians

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

IT is indeed a triumph of the gardener when he is able to go into the woods, and find there some rare plant or flowering shrub that is growing wild, where no one can see its beauty, and he is able to take it out by the roots and bring it to his garden, and transplant it with so much care, and bestow upon it such skilful attention, that he coaxes it to bloom again and send forth its fragrance under the new and strange conditions. There is something of the wildness of the woods from whence it was rescued about it, and as such it appeals to our imagination and awakens our interest.
But viewed simply as a flower or as a plant, I am sure it never will compare with the one that has through generations of plant and flower life grown and blossomed in the garden, and never known any other conditions, save the gentle care and harmony of the gardener's skilful attention.

It is something like that when a man or a woman who has been drawn away into the wild revels of sin, are sought after by some earnest gardener of the Lord and brought back again and made to bloom in Christ's garden. There is about it all something which appeals to the imagination, something that touches the fountain of pathos and tears, and awakens all that is noble to thanksgiving for the rescue. But if one studies the lives of those upon whom the great burdens of the world have rested, and looks into the spiritual story of those whose influence and character have most filled the atmosphere of our time with the fragrance of their Divine Lord, you will be astonished to find how many of them have been born to their human life, and born into the kingdom of God, seemingly at the same time. They have never been on the wild mountains of folly; they have never known the tangled woods of sin; they have drawn with their very mother's love in babyhood such a knowledge of God's love, and such a tender confidence in Jesus Christ, that they have grown up into his kingdom from childhood.

I have here two beautiful letters from two of the loveliest and noblest women, whom God has given to be a benediction to modern Christianity. One of them is from Margaret E. Sangster, whose poems and heart essays have made her dear to Christian men and women wherever the English language is spoken. Mrs. Sangster seems to be owned by us all. She has the wings of Christian love and sympathy, which carry her over all the barriers which handicap poor clodhoppers who have to go on foot. It is interesting to note that this good woman who is so universally beloved, and about whom millions never think without thanksgiving, was born in the garden of the Lord. In answer to my letter, asking for her testimony, she says very graciously, "I would gladly be of assistance to you in the matter concerning which you write, but my Christian life had no special period of beginning that I can remember. As the child of a Christian home, I grew up in Christian nurture, and when fourteen years of age united with the Presbyterian Church, in which my father was an elder.
Ever since I have lived day by day in trust and hope, accepting the Lord Jesus as my Master, Friend and Saviour."

My other letter, which I wish to include in the same setting, is from Mrs.

Frances E. Beauchamp, of Lexington, Ky., one of the most earnest and devoted Christian women I know, and one whose self-denying devotion has inspired the hosts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in her State.

In answer to a letter similar to the one written to Mrs. Sangster, Mrs. Beauchamp says: "My parents, especially my mother and her family, were intensely religious people. I think I was born under the influence of the Spirit. I have never known what it was not to love the Lord and willingly work for the coming of his kingdom. But I have had the strongest, sweetest testimony of the Spirit, that I have been born of God, since I gave myself unreservedly to the temperance reform. Oh! how I wish that every coming mother might be made to realize that her spiritual life and condition may, indeed must, shape the life of her child for time and eternity."

The early life of Mrs. Clinton Smith, head of the W. C. T. U., District of Columbia, was spent among the green hills of Vermont. Her father was a mineralogist, a very studious man, and taught his daughter to think. She was an only child, carefully reared, and was proud of the steady integrity of her race. At the age of sixteen, feeling the responsibility of her position, she decided to become a Christian. No outside pressure was brought to bear upon her. She came to the decision judiciously, from a sense of duty to God and humanity. But how to do it was another matter. She had supposed that one of her correct life and lofty principles, had but to offer herself, as it were, to be accepted; but as she examined her motives, and the Holy Spirit turned on the light, she discerned depths of pride and selfishness in her sinful heart that horrified her. In seeking to be a Christian, she discovered her need of regeneration, and began truly to repent.
When the sinfulness of her heart, and the false attitude in which she had approached the Lord were made plain to her conscience, she was cast into the horrible pit of black despair, and struggled there for six long months.

All this was owing to her ignorance of spiritual things. At length when she could endure no longer her sense of peril, helplessness and unworthiness, she reached a desperate resolution. On her knees, one dreadful night, she cried to God, "I will never move from this spot till I am forgiven, though I die here." A period of frenzied supplication was followed by calm and exhaustion, and then the still small voice reached her. Then it was that the old hymn was realized in her heart, and "heaven came down her soul to greet, and glory crowned the mercy seat."
The years that have come and gone have only deepened that sweet experience, the richness of which has strengthened her heart and character for her noble work of public service.

GROWTH OF THE KINGDOM

The Progress of Recent Times Affording Ground for Hope and Encouragement

FROM the pessimistic utterances of despondent critics, the inference is often drawn that the kingdom of Christ is not growing, but declining. It is easy to find facts to support such an opinion. There are abundant reasons for depression. In numbers, the church has but a comparatively small following. Of the population of the world, estimated at fifteen hundred millions, only one hundred and seventy millions, or less than a third, are set down as Christians. These how small is the proportion to whom Christianity is more than a name! Nearly one-half of the entire number, or 8,000,000, are Roman Catholics. Of Protestants, set down at 143,000,000, probably less than a third are actual members of churches. In our own country, in which about 60,000,000 are counted nominally as Protestants, only about 18,000,000 are communicants. And the rate of increase is small. Scarcely anywhere does it keep pace with the increase in population. In influence the Church wields but a comparatively small power. No one, observing the life of our great cities, could suppose that Christian principles did much to do with municipal government. It is true that the wealth of the church is growing, that it has many costly edifices and is continually building more; but wealth has never been considered a sign of spirituality. So that when we examine our position there is slender basis for congratulation.

Nevertheless there is sure ground for hope. While the situation is not what we would wish it to be, nor what it ought to be, nor what it might have been if the Church had been diligent and earnest and faithful, there has been progress, and greater progress in recent than in former times. The century just closed has witnessed advances greater than any of its immediate predecessors. At its beginning, many of the most aggressive movements of our day were not in existence or we in their early infancy. Very few missionaries at work in heathen lands, probably not more than twenty. There are now 15,460 foreign missionaries, with 71,137 native helpers, and there are 1,280,957 communicants. The century witnessed the birth or development of the Bible Societies, the Sunday School, the Salvation Army, and a host of philanthropic movements. All this shows that the rate of progress has not declined, but has increased in recent times. We have passed through the period of organization, during which the Church has been preparing herself for future work. Comparing the nineteenth century with the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries, we have a right to feel encouraged. If the results are small, the energy has been awakened which must produce results far in excess of anything the world has yet witnessed. The kingdom has grown in vigor and consecration and activity, if in nothing else. It is not dead, nor asleep, but is ever putting forth new power and pining for new conquests and bringing to bear on the problems of its work the best thought of its most able and devoted men.

That there is much land still to be occupied cannot be denied. There are heathen districts in our great cities almost as dark as in Africa. The number of missionaries in heathen lands in proportion to population is ridiculously inadequate. But a beginning has been made, and the spirit of consecration is in vigorous exercise. We are witnessing the growth of the Kingdom as Christ foresaw it. The heaven is gradually transforming the meal; the wheat is growing with the tares. It is a picture that the tares are so numerous and so vigorous, but it is consolatory to realize that nothing unexpected has occurred. Even the evil of a divided Christendom has had its beneficial result in promoting agitation and a holy rivalry in good work. There is also a growth in comradeship. The denominations are no longer enemies, but fellow citizens, and recognize one another as such. That is a most encouraging sign, for the forces of darkness have pined greatly by the division of the forces of light. There is also a growth in knowledge. Never before was so much light brought to bear on the Word of God. Scholars have gleaned from the literature of ancient peoples knowledge which enables us to understand the Bible better than our fathers did. We know now how it was written, and have learned the meaning of much that before was obscure. The difficulties which kept many sincere minds from accepting Christianity have been removed, and it is no longer made a condition to their admission to the Kingdom that they should believe things that to them were incredible. If they have the spirit of Christ and love and follow him, they can find some branch of the Church that will welcome them, and so we have grown by adding to our faith, charity.

Christian Workers in Council

A CONFERENCE which, it may be hoped, will become the precursor of many others, has been held at Sea Cliff, Long Island, N. Y. It commenced on Saturday, Aug. 31, and continued until Thursday, Sept. 5. It was a gathering of local Christian workers engaged in efforts of many kinds, but all tending to the extension of Christ's kingdom and the betterment of the world. These workers are laboring in their own way, day by day, during the year, each in his own sphere, striving to bring men to Christ and to relieve the burdens which our strenuous social life lays on the shoulders of the poor. It was suggested early in the present year that if these workers could be brought together they might be cheered and helped in their work by sympathetic addresses, and might gain new stimulus from mutual consultation. The result was the conference in the quiet Long Island village of Sea Cliff.

At the first session on Saturday there was a cordial reception of the visitors, at which Rev. W. D. Morgan, of St. Luke's Church; Dr. Russell H. Conwell, of Philadelphia, and other well-known ministers, gave the workers hearty welcome. In the evening Dr. Walter Laidlaw, Secretary of the Federation of Churches in New York, spoke of the advantages of union and co-operation in Christian effort. On Sunday, Prof. Frank K. Sanders, of Yale University, gave one of a series of lectures, which were continued on each day of the conference, on "The Prophets of the Eighth Century Before Christ." A sermon appropriate to the occasion was delivered by Rev. Henry Lewis, and in the evening Mr. James B. Reynolds, Head-worker of the University Settlement in New York, described the Settlement's work. Commander S. V. Wadhams, U. S. N., told what was being done for the sailors on our ships, and spoke of the dangers and temptations by which they are surrounded. Monday was Sunday-School day. Rev. Lester Bradner, Dr. A. H. McKenney and Dr. Philip S. Moxom, of Springfield, Mass., were the leaders.

Tuesday was Brotherhood Day. Miss Sorabji, our Christian Parsee visitor from India, delivered an interesting address on the contrast between brotherhood and caste as it is seen in India, and showed how much is being done by the missionary to bring together, in her native land, the long separated members of society. Rev. J. G. Mannen, secretary of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Phillip, described the work done by that organization, and Mr. Alexander M. Hadden reported for the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Mr. George M. Dean spoke of the work for boys, and Frank Harvey Field and Mornay Williams described the operations of the religious societies of young people.

On Wednesday the subject was the Rescue Work of our great cities. Miss Helen F. Clark narrated her experience among the Chinese and other Oriental immigrants. Hon. Samuel J. Barrows told of the efforts for the rescue of discharged prisoners, and Dr. H. Allen Tupper spoke of the power of the Christian religion to reclaim wrongdoers of all classes.

Thursday, the closing day of the Conference, was a day of personal consecration. Rev. George C. Groves, of Christ Chapel, Brooklyn, led the morning service, and Rev. Percy S. Grant, of New York, the evening service. Among the speakers were Rev. Lindsay V. Longacre, of Amity Theological School, and Archdeacon Bryan. The Conference closed with a general feeling of renewed power and inspiration for future work.

CASH FOR YOUR REAL ESTATE NO MATTER WHERE IT IS

W. M. OSTRANDER

I HAVE a modern, practical, simple plan for quickly finding cash buyers. Send description of your property and let me know your cash price. I will then go over the matter and write you a personal letter, telling exactly how my plan can be made to fit your individual requirements. It does not matter whether your property is worth $500 or $500,000, or in what city, state or territory it is located, or whether it is a farm, residence, business, timber, mineral or other property; I can tell you how to convert it into cash. I make no charge for outlining the plan. I will also send my booklet (without charge), which gives interesting details about the unique methods to which I owe my great success. And a sample copy of "Ostrander's Monthly" will interest you. If you want to buy any kind of real estate in any part of the country, tell me what you want and where you want it, and, approximately, what you would be disposed to pay, and I will tell you what I can do for you. The chances are that I have or can secure the very property you want. I am spending more than $5,000.00 monthly in advertising my clients' properties. If you want to profit by this wide publicity, write to me.

IF YOU WANT TO SELL, Be Sure to State the Selling Price, Size, Kind, and Location of Your Property

161 ACRES IN SOMERSET CO., N. J.

THIS fine farm is located about 4½ miles north of Princeton, N. J. One hundred and fifty acres are tillable. There is a 7-acre orchard of apples, peaches, plums, grapes, and small fruit. The house is 18 x 58, with two wings 18 x 24 and 17 x 28.

There is a barn, 30 x 50, with lean-to 12 x 30; horse and cow barn, hovel, two wagon houses, crib house, grain barn and barrack in field. A large stream borders on the land, and there are, besides, two dug wells and a cistern. Post-office and railway station are only two miles away. The farm complete with stock, machinery and implements, is offered at the very low figure of $9,000—$4,000 cash. Write for full details.

A PROFITABLE ARKANSAS PROPERTY

THIS desirable corner property covers four lots (total size, 100 x 200). It is only ¼ mile from the railroad station.

The house contains nine rooms and bath, city water, four porches, and balcony on second story. It has been built only four years and was improved and modernized last year. There is a stable 12 x 24, poultry house, 3 pens, scratch sheds, steam heated greenhouse with 300 feet of 2 inch pipe and heater, shop, and woodshed. The greenhouse is the only one in this section, and does a profitable business in early vegetables. The poultry house also pays well. Electric lights and telephone could easily be put in by purchaser, as the connections are close at hand. Owner desires to move to the East, where his business interests call him, and will sell for $2,200—one-third cash. I have other Arkansas properties, at various prices. Tell me what you want.

THE REST OF THE YEAR FREE

Yearly subscriptions for PETS AND ANIMALS received during October will be entered to run until the end of 1902, thus giving absolutely free the remaining issues of this year, including the splendid September double number. This issue contains the first installment of Ernest Ingersoll's "The Story of Our Domestic Animals," which will run through twelve numbers. These articles will tell the origin of each species of the animals with which we are familiar in every-day life, its native country, the part its domestication has played in the rise of man from savagery through barbarism to civilization, and something as to the different breeds and their usefulness. Mr. Ingersoll is noted as one of the most competent writers on natural history. His articles alone will be well worth the subscription price of

Pets and Animals, Only 50 Cents a Year

Each number also contains a wealth of other valuable matter. PETS AND ANIMALS is a journal for the whole family, of interest to every member, especially the children. It appeals to all whose hearts are young. Clever stories, attractive illustrations and articles of an instructive character are blended in most readable form. It teaches thoughtfulness, kindness and mercy, and uses the literature of the animal kingdom, always of absorbing interest to young people, as a means of illustrating these great lessons. There is no publication like it. One subscriber writes: "It seems as if it were edited by inspiration." A business man says: "It has stimulated the entire household in the study of natural history, in which we have all learned many wonderful things not known before." Sample copy free on request.

Our Special October Introduction Offer

For 50 cents, the regular price for one year, PETS AND ANIMALS will be mailed sixteen months, from September, 1901, to the end of 1902. For 10 cents the journal will be sent four months on trial. Address, Publishers PETS AND ANIMALS, 62 Citizens Bank Building, Springfield, Ohio.

We will send the piano or your choice of 23 other Wing Pianos on trial to any part of the United States, all freight paid by us. We will allow ample time for a thorough examination of the piano in the home, and if the piano is not entirely satisfactory in every respect we will take it back at our own expense. There is no risk or expense to the person ordering the piano. No money is sent to us in advance, we pay all freights.

THE INSTRUMENTAL ATTACHMENT

Imitates perfectly the tone of the Mandolin, Guitar, Harp, Zither and Banjo. Music written for these instruments, with or without piano accompaniment, can be played just as perfectly by a single player on the piano as though rendered by a piano orchestra. The original instrumental attachment has been patented by us and it cannot be had in any other piano, although there are several imitations of it.

Description of Style 29.

7 1-3 Octaves.
Double lever, grand repeating action.
Grand scale, overstrung bass; three strings to each note in middle and treble registers.
The scale is the same as in grand pianos, with the largest size of sound board and strings of greatest length, thus giving the greatest volume of power and tone.
CASE—Double veneered inside and outside.
Choice of superior Circassian walnut, rich figured mahogany, genuine quartered oak or ebonized.
KEYS—Of best ivory and ebony.
IMPROVEMENTS—Wing Pianos have the following improvements, viz.: "Built up" with plank construction. "Dovetail" top and bottom frame case construction. Full metal plate, with metal depression bar and metal supports for key bed. Improved noiseless direct motion action. Improved practice attachment. Full length duet music desk. Carved panels. Instrumental attachment.

The usual way to buy a piano is from a retail agent or dealer. We do not sell pianos in this way, but supply our pianos direct from our factory to retail purchasers. There are a great many advantages in buying direct from the factory. The most important is the saving in price. We do not employ a single salesman or agent, and we have no salesroom except our factory. We transact all of our business and sell all pianos direct from our factory and our expenses are small, and as we sell a much larger number of pianos than any dealer or retail firm, a very small profit pays us.

No matter how far away you live, our improved system of doing business makes it actually more convenient and more satisfactory to buy a piano from us than to buy from a local dealer in your own town or city. Write us and receive full particulars. We sell the Wing Piano on easy terms of payment and take old instruments in exchange.

...AN AMERICAN WOMAN IN IMPERIAL PALACES...

On Kwang Su's Dragon-Throne

CHINA'S ANCIENT RUINS AND GOSPEL MISSIONS.....

By MRS. J. WOODBERRY

ON May 4, in the midst of a sailor's reception, in Beulah Chapel, Shanghai, we said Good-bye for a month, and took passage on the Lien Shing, for a flying visit to Peking and to Tientsin, our old home, which we had left in blissful ignorance of unhappy coming events five weeks before the bombardment. We were in Chinese costume, and our hands were filled with Gospels to "Sow beside all waters." A veritable smash-up of China greeted us in the North. Not a village remained of the eighty or more in which we sowed Gospels four years ago. A few miles above Tonku we took the railroad for Tientsin. Imagine the changes we saw where the dragon flag has so long floated—scores of English, American, German, French, Russian, and Italian flags decorated the boundaries of each long miles of river front, and were displayed on all the Chinese craft and soared aloft on the buildings! Our superannuated battleship, U. S. S. Monocacy (called by the Chinese "My No Can See") proudly rode at anchor below the forts. And H. M. S. Phoenix, a few miles above, ships of all nations lying suggestively between. The Phoenix commands a cove of a pretty bit of shoreland. Hsin-Ho, that has the appearance of the beginning of a Colony Farm." The Americans were on the march from Peking to the sea. Four years ago my husband and I traversed this region on a houseboat and a foot, selling Gospels from house to house. We were pelted with mud and stones. As if by miracle, we saw the land transformed now before our eyes. A Russian division marched past, fierce and sullen, chanting as in the Middle Ages. Handsomely uniformed Sikhs, Royal Welsh Fusiliers, and British marines guarded the streets and depot and train.

At Tientsin, ruins everywhere greeted our eyes, and a rusty cannon stood in the bed of the canal, where we had baptized so many Chinese students. Corially received by Mr. and Mrs. Mills, at the China Inland Mission Home, where so many of God's children found welcome refuge during the distress, we were, for the next few days, busy visiting our soldier boys in hospital and camp. A memorable walk was taken on the Lord's day, scattering Gospels and tracts up and down Taku Road, and putting them in all the saloons. This great thoroughfare is now teeming with saloons and kindred resorts, and is the Broadway of the city. As I saw the soldiers of many nations throng this road, I thought of the thousands of homes and mothers far away. At the head of this street stands the elegant Y. M. C. A. building, the gift of Mrs. Livingstone Taylor, of Cleveland, Ohio, presided over by Secretary Robert Gailey, who has done some good work for the Army boys at Tientsin.

Beyond the Y. M. C. A., we entered the former Tientsin University, now German Hospital, and distributed tracts to the convalescents in the yard. These two fine buildings were the pride of many Chinese students, now scattered far and wide. The same day, some forty of our former Beulah Chapel students assembled at the China Inland Mission. They represented the Imperial Chinese Medical and Telegraph Schools, and were eager for the Gospel. The Imperial Medical College, under the patronage of Li Hung Chang, was our chief field "white enlarged concession, but it is to go on as heretofore. Nameless heaps of ruins greeted us in the native city, where from the summit of the central "Drum Tower," our eyes swept over the city and plains. The ancient walls that once girdled the city of at least a hundred thousand, were flat! The huge gates, through which we passed in former days to sell Gospels, and be surrounded by mobs, were gone! Or wide open to the passer-by! A fine broad carriage way wound for miles along the once crowded, filthy bank of the Pei Ho. The new buildings are a great improvement on the old, and advantages have been taken by the Provisional Government which will make residence in Tientsin more attractive. Eighty miles more on the railroad bore us to the gates of the Temple of Heaven, surrounded by noise anything but like angelic music, as ricksha coolies clamor for our attention, and speed us on our way to the city of the Emperor, who styles himself the "Son of Heaven." Nothing could have better convinced us of the conquests of the Allies than the presence of the comfortable little jinricksha! The notorious Peking carts are losing their hold on even the "celestial" mind, and baggage (not passengers) is now bumped over unspeakable roads of the Chinese and Tartar cities.

In Peking, unsightly ruins greeted us again; but innumerable little flags floated gaily everywhere, and the docile, imperturbable Chinese appeared to vie with each other in our honor! Peking was pulsing with new life, after the sleep of ages. The Dowager Empress, on her return, will be more surprised than Rip Van Winkle. When we desired to call on the missionaries, we were taken to Chinese mansions and the palatial residences of Princes and Mandarins! They were all busy again working for the Master, but quite unconscious of their heroism. Many of them were sorrowing over the loss and martyrdom of their flocks, like Rachel of old. When the dukes and earls of Peking come back to their palaces, the Lord will provide shelter for these his servants whose homes were destroyed. We were entertained by Dr. Lily Saville, of the London Mission, who, besides looking after numerous patients in and out of the hospital, superintends sewing and Bible classes, and looks after "mansion" servants, etc., like a young queen in the midst of her subjects.

It was a very unique privilege to scatter Gospels through the Imperial palace, and "Forbidden City." It is difficult to describe vividly all that we saw in the

to the harvest" in Tientsin. Twenty-three members of the former graduating class were baptized. The old Junior Class of the Medical College when the trouble began, and were impressed into Hospital Service, recently passed in a body through Shanghai, and related their varied experiences at our Beulah Chapel Reception; they had been in the heat of the conflict, and had some narrow escapes; the most sceptical gave God the glory, and believed the Christian students "prayed" them through!

KINDNESS

TEXT—Acts 28:2:

The Barbarous People showed us no little kindness

HERE we are on the Island of Malta, another name for Melita. This island, which has always been an important commercial centre, belonging at different times to Phœnicia, to Greece, to Rome, to Arabia, to Spain, to France, now belongs to England. The area of the island is about one hundred square miles. It is in the Mediterranean Sea, and of such clarity of atmosphere that Mt. Etna, one hundred and thirty miles away, can be distinctly seen. The island is gloriously memorable, because the Knights of Malta for a long while ruled there, but most famous because of the apostolic shipwreck. The bestormed vessel on which Paul sailed had "laid to" on the star-board tack, and the wind was blowing east-northeast, and the vessel, drifting probably a mile and a half an hour, she struck at what is now called St. Paul's Bay. Practical sailors have taken up the Bible account, and decided beyond controversy the place of the shipwreck. But the island, which has so rough a coast, is for the most part a garden. Richest fruits and a profusion of honey characterized it in Paul's time as well as now. The finest oranges, figs and olives grow there.

When Paul and his comrades, crawled up on the beach, saturated, and hungry from long abstinence from food, and chilled to the bone, the islanders, though called barbarians, because they could not speak Greek, opened their doors to the shipwrecked unfortunates. Everything had gone to the bottom of the deep, and the barefooted, bareheaded apostle and ship's crew were in a condition to appreciate hospitality. About twenty-five such men a few years ago I found in the life station near East Hampton, Long Island. They had got ashore in the night from the sea, and not a hat or shoe had they left. They found out, as Paul and his fellow voyagers found out, that the sea is the roughest of all robbers. My text finds the ship's crew ashore on Malta, and around a hot fire drying themselves, and with the best provision the islanders can offer them. And they go into government quarters for three days to recuperate, Publius, the ruler, inviting them, although he had severe sickness in the house at that time, his father down with a dangerous illness. Yea, for three months they stayed on the island watching for a ship, and putting the hospitalities of the islanders to a severe test. But it endured the test satisfactorily, and it is recorded for all the ages of time and eternity to read and hear in regard to the inhabitants of Malta: "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness."

A Word Gentle and Mighty

Kindness! What a great word that is. It would take a reed as long as that which the apocalyptic angel used to measure heaven to tell the length, the breadth, the height of that munificent word. It is a favorite Bible word, and it is early launched in the book of Genesis, caught up in the book of Joshua, embraced in the book of Ruth, sworn by in the book of Samuel, crowned in the book of Psalms, and enthroned in many places in the New Testament. Kindness! A word no more gentle than mighty.

There is kindness of disposition, kindness of word, kindness of act, and there is Jesus Christ, the impersonation of all of them. Kindness! You cannot affect it, you cannot play it as a part, you cannot enact it, you cannot dramatize it. By the grace of God you must have it inside you, an everlasting summer, or rather a combination of June and October, the geniality of the one and the tonic of the other. It cannot dwell with arrogance or spite, or revenge or malevolence. At its first appearance in the soul all these Amalekites and Gergishites and Hittites and Jebusites must quit, and quit forever. Kindness is a spirit divinely implanted, and in answer to prayer, and then to be sedulously cultivated until it fills all the nature with a perfume richer and more pungent than mignonette, and, as if you put a tuft of that aromatic beauty behind the clock on the mantel, or in some corner where nobody can see it, you find people walking about your room looking this way and that, and you ask them, "What are you looking for?" and they answer, "Where is that flower?" So if one has in his soul this infinite sweetness of disposition, its perfume will overwhelm everything.

The King of Prussia had presented to him by the Empress of Russia the root of a rare flower, and it was put in the royal gardens on an island, and the head gardener, Herr Fintleman, was told to watch it. And one day it put forth its glory. Three days of every week the people were admitted to these gardens, and a young man, probably not realizing what a wrong thing he was doing, plucked this flower, and put it in his buttonhole, and the gardener arrested him as he was crossing at the ferry, and asked the king to throw open no more his gardens to the public. The king replied: "Shall I deny to the thousands of good people of my country the privilege of seeing this garden because one visitor has done wrong? No, let them come and see the beautiful grounds." And when the gardener wished to give the king the name of the offender who had taken the royal flower he said: "No, my memory is very tenacious, and I do not want to have in my mind the name of the offender, lest it should hinder me granting him a favor some other time." Now, I want you to know that kindness is a royal flower, and blessed be God, the King of mercy and grace, that by a divine gift and not by purloining, we may pluck this royal flower, and not wear it on the outside of our nature, but wear it in our soul and wear it forever, its radiance and aroma not more wonderful for time than wonderful for eternity.

Still further, I must speak of kindness of word. When you meet anyone do you say a pleasant thing or an unpleasant? Do you tell him of agreeable things you have heard about him, or the disagreeable? When he leaves you does he feel better or does he feel worse? Oh, the power of the tongue for the production of happiness or misery! One would think from the way the tongue is caged in we might take the hint that it has a dangerous power. First, it is chained to the back part of the mouth by strong muscle. Then it is surrounded by the teeth of the lower jaw, so many ivory bars, and then by the teeth of the upper jaw, more ivory bars. Then, outside of all, are the two lips, with the power of compression and arrest. And yet, notwithstanding these four imprisonments or limitations, how many take no hint in regard to the dangerous power of the tongue, and the results are laceration, scarification, and damnation. There are those if they know a good thing about you and a bad thing, will mention the bad thing, and act as though they had never heard the good thing. Now there are two sides to almost everyone's character, and we have the choice of overhauling the virtue or the vice. We can greet Paul and the ship's crew as they come up the beach of Malta, with the words, "What a sorry-looking set you are! How little of navigation you must know to run on these rocks! Didn't you know better than to put out on the Mediterranean this wintry month? It was not much of a ship anyhow, or it would not have gone to pieces so soon as that. Well, what do you want? We have hard enough work to make a living for ourselves without having thrust on us two hundred and seventy-six ragamuffins." Not so said the Maltese. I think they said: "Come in! Sit down by the fire, and warm yourselves. Glad that you all got off with your lives. Make yourselves at home. You are welcome to all we have until some ship comes in sight, and you resume your voyage. Here, let me put a bandage on your forehead, for that is an ugly gash you got from the floating timbers. And here is a man with a broken arm, we will have a doctor come to attend to this fracture." And though for three months the kindness went on, we have little more than this brief record: "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness."

Optimist and Pessimist

Oh! say the cordial thing! Say the useful thing! Say the hospitable thing! Say the helpful thing! Say the Christ-like thing! Say the kind thing! I admit that this is easier for some temperaments than for others. Some are born pessimists, and some are born optimists, and that demonstrates itself all through everything. It is a cloudy morning. You meet a pessimist, and you say: "What weather to-day?" He answers: "It's going to storm;" and umbrella under arm and water-proof overcoat show that he is honest in that utterance. On the same block, a minute after, you meet an optimist, and you say: "What weather to-day?" "Good weather; this is only a fog and will soon scatter." The absence of umbrella and absence of water-proof overcoat show it is an honest utterance. On your way at noon to luncheon you meet an optimistic merchant, and you say: "What do you think of the commercial prospects?" and he says: "Glorious. Crops not so good as usual, but foreign demand will make big prices. We are going to have such an autumn and winter of prosperity as we have never seen." On your way back to your store, you meet a pessimistic merchant. "What do you think of the commercial prospects?" you ask. And he answers: "Well, I don't know. Wheat and corn crop blasted in Kansas and Missouri, and the grain gamblers will get their fist in; and the hay crop is short in some places; and in the southern part of Wisconsin they had a hailstorm, and our business is as dull as it ever was." You will find the same difference in judgment of character. A man of good reputation is assailed and charged with some evil deed. At the first story, the pessimist will believe in guilt. "The papers said so, and that's enough. Down with him!" The optimist will say: "I don't believe a word of it. I don't think that a man that has been as useful and seemingly honest for twenty years could get off track like that. There are two sides to every story, and I will wait to hear the other side before I condemn him." My hearer, if you are by nature a pessimist, make a special effort by the grace of God to extirpate the dolorous and the hypercritical from your disposition. Believe nothing against anybody, until wrong is established by at least two witnesses of integrity. And, if guilt be proven, find out the extenuating circumstances if there are any. Kindness! Let us morning, noon and night pray for it until we get it.

Furthermore there is kindness of action. This is what Joseph showed to his outrageous brothers. This is what David showed to Mephibosheth for his father Jonathan's sake. That is what Onesiphorus showed to Paul in the Roman penitentiary. That is what William Cowper recognized when he said he would not trust a man who would with his foot needlessly crush a worm. That is what our assassinated President Lincoln demonstrated when his private secretary found him in the Capitol grounds trying to get a bird back to the nest from which it had fallen, and which quality the illustrious man exhibited years before when, hanging with some lawyers in the carriage on the way to court, passed on the road a swine fast in the mire, and while cried to his horses, "Ho!" and said to the gentlemen, "I must go back and help that hog out of the mire." And he did go back, and put on solid ground that most uninteresting quadruped. That was the spirit that was manifested by my departed friend, I. N. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia (and lover and never exchanged earth for heaven). When at Wilmington, a Senator's wife, who told us of the circumstances, said to him, "Mr. Stephens, come and see my dead canary bird." And he answered, "No, I could not look at the poor thing without crying." That is the spirit which last night ten thousand mothers showed to their sick children, coming to give the drink at the first call as cheerfully and as tenderly as at the first call.

A Transformed World

Suppose all this assemblage, and all to whom these words shall come by printer's type, should resolve to make kindness an overarching, undergirding and all-pervading principle of their life, and then carry out the resolution, why, in six months the whole earth would feel it. People would say: "What is the matter? It seems to me that the world is getting to be a better place to live in. Why, life after all is worth living. Why, there is Shylock, my neighbor, has withdrawn his lawsuit of foreclosure against that man, and because he has had so much sickness in his family, he is going to have the house for one year rent free. There is a lawyer in that young lawyer's office, and do you know what he has gone in there for? Why, he is helping to fix up a case which is too big for the young man to handle, and the white-haired attorney is hunting up previous decisions, and making out a brief for the boy. Do you know that a strange thing has taken place in the pulpit, and all the old ministers are helping the young ministers, and all the old doctors are helping the young doctors, and the farmers are assisting each other in gathering the harvest, and for that farmer who is sick the neighbors have made a 'bee,' as they call it, and they have all turned in to help him get his crops into the garner. And I heard this morning of a poor old man whose three children were in hot debate as to who should take care of him in his declining days. The oldest son declared it was his right because he was the oldest, and the youngest son said it was his right because he was the youngest, and Mary said it was her right because she better understood father's ways, and rheumatism, and poor spells, and knew better how to nurse him, and the only way the difficulty could be settled was by the old man's promise that he would divide the year into three parts, and spend a third of his time with each one of them. And neighboring stores in the same line of goods on the same block are doing kindly to each other. It seems to me that those words of Isaiah are being fulfilled when he says, 'The carpenter encouraged the goldsmith, and he that smoothed with the hammer, him that smote the anvil, saying, I am ready for the soldering.' What is the matter? It seems to me our old world is picking up. Why, the millennium must be coming in. Kindness has gotten the victory."

The Supreme Example

My hearers, you know and I know we are far from that state of things. But why not inaugurate a new dispensation of geniality. If we cannot yet have a millennium on a large scale, let us have it on a small scale, and under our own vestments. Kindness! If this world is ever brought to God that is the thing that will do it. You cannot fret the world up although you may fret the world down. You cannot scold it into excellence or reformation or godliness.

A Peace Congress of all the Americas

By CHARLES M. PEPPER, one of the Delegates

THE LATE PRES. MCKINLEY

H. G. DAVIS

W. I. BUCHANAN

V. W. FOSTER

JOHN BARRETT

CHAS. M. PEPPER

PRESIDENT DIAZ

PEACE among the nations was always a gospel part of the late President McKinley's public policy. When he was a member of Congress from Ohio, in 1886, he introduced a bill, authorizing the Government to invite the other governments of America to send delegates to an International Congress, the purpose of which should be to arrange the settlement of national differences by arbitration. In the wisdom of Providence, years after he had introduced this bill, it was given to him, as President of the United States, to take the lead in calling a Congress which has for one of its chief purposes the establishment of a fixed plan of arbitration. Officially the gathering will be known as the International Conference of American States, but popularly will be called the Pan-American Congress. "Pan" means all, and all the nations of the American continent have accepted invitations to take part in the proceedings, and have appointed delegates. The total membership will be about forty, and will include many of the eminent men of Mexico, Central and South America. The meeting will take place in the city of Mexico, and the opening session will be held Oct. 22d. Mr. Ariscal, the Mexican Secretary of State, will deliver an address of welcome on behalf of the Mexican Government, which is the host. President Diaz has shown great interest in the Congress, and Mexico itself appreciates the compliment which is paid it. A chance will be afforded to learn something of the great strides which this Republic has taken under the liberal and progressive administration of President Diaz. Though the meeting place of the Conference is in Mexico, the first steps taken towards calling it were on the suggestion of the late President. Inasmuch as the last Pan-American Congress was held in Washington, it seemed proper that the present one should meet in one of the Latin-American countries. The representatives from those countries agreed among themselves that Mexico would be the most fitting place. In response to their wishes, the Mexican Government issued a formal invitation, reciting that in America there are special interests and closer bonds between its inhabitants, with fewer international complications, secure the welfare of her people. This is the spirit which the Congress will meet. It is not hostile to the Old World, but it realizes that all the nations of the American Continent are knit closely together and have interests in common which are no concern of Europe. The programme for the Conference was laid down by the Executive Committee of the Bureau of American Republics in Washington, but it is understood to be of suggestive nature rather than of a binding character. Because of differences of opinion with regard to the programme, some of the South American countries for a time hesitated to accept. Finally, they decided to reserve their rights, and to take part in the proceedings. They will be governed by circumstances in laying down the subjects on which the Conference shall take action, and no country will be asked to acquiesce in any course of procedure by which it declines to be bound. The right of withdrawal is just as strong as the right of entry. Absolute equality between the nations will prevail, hence it will come about that the United States will have one vote, just as Paraguay, or Chile, or Costa Rica will have one vote.

In the programme of the Conference arbitration has a chief place. That is why this may be called a Peace Congress of all Americans. If it fail to realize all the ideals of peace, its members at least will seek to broaden the field of arbitration.

But while arbitration is a main topic it is not the only one. Linked to this is the possibility of an international court of claims. Measures for the protection of agriculture, commerce and industry are in the programme, as also are transportation and railroad building. This means closer intercourse between the peoples of the different countries. Whatever draws them closer together gives them a better understanding of one another. Moreover, there is no such force of Christian civilization as commerce and industry. People busied in the peaceful pursuits of life and protected in those pursuits are not likely to engage in broils among themselves or with their neighbors. War becomes abhorrent to them.

I do not forget that in the past, Congresses of this kind have been held. Some have partly fulfilled expectations; some have disappointed the hopes held out for them. Yet all have had their uses. Several of these Conferences have been limited to countries in which the language and laws were the same, that is to say, the Spanish speaking countries. In others the United States has taken part.

During the last half century the most notable of these Pan-American Congresses was that held in Washington in the winter of 1889-90. James G. Blaine was then Secretary of State. It was his grand ideal to weld together the nations of the American continent, so that they would move forward each in its own path, yet along a common highway. He hoped the time would come when war and conquest would be banished from the American hemisphere.

Though not all of Mr. Blaine's grand ideals were realized at the Conference over which he presided, nevertheless a firm foundation was laid. It is on that foundation that the present Conference may hope to build. In one sense it is only a continuation of the Conference of 1890.

President McKinley, in naming the delegates from the United States, sought to secure men who would be representative of the disinterested motives of this country. They are five in number, and they serve without pay.

First among them is Henry G. Davis, for two terms United States Senator from West Virginia, who through a long lifetime has been identified with the development of the industries of his native State. Mr. Davis was a member of the Conference of 1890, and he therefore becomes a link connecting the two gatherings. He was also a member of the commission which was appointed as the outcome of that Conference to formulate plans for what is known as the Inter-Continental Railway. The plan is for a railway running north and south, which will furnish a trunk line from the United States through Mexico and Central America to the countries of South America. Mr. Davis will have the satisfaction of having this subject also considered by the present gathering.

Mr. W. I. Buchanan has become very well known to the American public during the last year as the Director-General of the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo. Before taking that position, he had served the United States for five years as Minister to the Argentine Republic, and has made a fine record for himself and for his country. He possesses great knowledge of all the South American questions, and his experience will be of special value to the Conference, of which he is a member. Mr. Buchanan is an authority on the subject of arbitration, and it was through his good offices that a long pending dispute between Chile and the Argentine Republic was settled.

Mr. Volney W. Foster is one of the typical business men of the West, yet his business pursuits have not kept him from taking an interest in public affairs. He is president of the Union League Club of Chicago, and is identified with various educational movements there. He has delivered many short, crisp speeches which show him to be a thinker and a student. Mr. Foster has spent much time in Mexico, where he is interested in important commercial and industrial projects.

Mr. John Barrett is one of the younger men among the delegates. He is a graduate of Dartmouth College, but for several years has lived on the Pacific Coast. He served as Minister to Siam during President Cleveland's administration, and traveled extensively through Asia and the far East till he became one of the leading authorities on that part of the world. He was also in the Philippines with Admiral Dewey during the Spanish-American war. Recently Mr. Barrett has been appointed Commissioner General of the St. Louis World's Fair to Asia, Australia and the Philippines.

KINDNESS

The East wind and the West wind were one day talking with each other, and the East wind said to the West wind: "Don't you wish you had my power? Why, when I start they hail me by storm signals all along the coast. I can twist off a ship's mast as easily as a cow's hoof cracks an alder. With one sweep of my wing, I have strewn the coast from Newfoundland to Key West with parted ship-timber. I can lift and have lifted the Atlantic Ocean. I am the terror of all valdism, and to fight me back forests must be cut down for fires, and the mines of continents are called to feed the furnaces. Under my breath the nations touch into sepulchres. Don't you wish you had my power?" said the East wind. The West wind made no answer, but started on its mission, coming somewhere out of the rosy bowers of the sky, and all the rivers and lakes and seas smiled at its coming. The gardens bloomed, and the orchards ripened, and the wheat elds turned their silver into gold, and health clapped its hands, and joy shouted from the hill tops, and the nations lifted their foreheads into the light, and the earth had a doxology for the sky, and the sky an anthem for the earth, and the warmth and sparkle and the gladness, and the foliage, and the flowers, and the fruits, and the beauty, and the life, were the only answer the West wind made to the insolence of the East wind's interrogation.

Kindness to all! Surely it ought not to be a difficult grace to culture when we see towering above the centuries such an example that one glimpse of it ought to melt and transform all nations. Kindness brought our Lord from Heaven. Kindness to miscreants, kindness to persecutors, kindness to the crippled, and the blind, and the cataleptic, and the leprous, and the dropsical, and the demoniacal, characterized him all the way, and on the Cross, kindness to the bandits suffering on the side of him, and kindness to the executioners while yet they pushed the spear, and hammered the spikes, and howled the blasphemies. All the stories of the John Howards, and the Florence Nightingales, and the Grace Darlings, and the Ida Lewises pale before this transcendent example of him whose birth and life and death are the greatest story that the world ever heard, and the theme of the mightiest hosanna that Heaven ever lifted. Yea, the very kindness that allowed both hands to be nailed to the horizontal timber of the Cross with that cruel thump! thump! now stretches down from the skies those same hands filled with balm for all our wounds, forgiveness for all our crimes, rescue for all our serfdoms.

And while we take this matchless kindness from God, may it be found that we have uttered our last bitter word, written our last cutting paragraph, done our last retaliatory action, felt our last revengeful heart-throb. And it would not be a bad epitaph for any of us, if, by the grace of God, from this time forth we lived such beneficent lives that the tombstone's chisel could appropriately cut upon the plain slab that marks our grave a suggestion from the text: "He showed us no little kindness." But not until the last child of God has got ashore from the earthly storms that drove him on the rocks like Mediterranean Euroclydons, not until all the thrones of heaven are mounted, and all the conquerors crowned, and all the harps and trumpets and organs of heaven are thrummed, or blown, or sounded, and the ransomed of all climes and ages are in full chorus under the jubilant swing of angelic baton, and we shall for thousands of years have seen the river from under the Throne rolling into the "sea of glass mingled with fire," and this world we now inhabit shall be so far in the past that only a stretch of celestial memory can recall that it ever existed at all, not until then will we understand what Nehemiah calls "the great kindness," and David calls "the marvelous kindness," and Isaiah calls "the everlasting kindness" of God!

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. These questions are printed Four weeks in advance so as to afford our readers an opportunity to answer them.

II. For answers to the questions which appear below, when accepted, we will allow compensation for the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append their name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Oct. 23

1. What measure should be taken to protect public men from Un-Americanism while maintaining their freedom of asylum and freedom of speech?
2. Ought the franchise to be restricted, or should we continue to allow the ignorant voter to cast a vote that counteracts the vote of the intelligent citizen?
3. If a pastor can no longer preach the doctrines of the church to which he belongs, ought he to resign, or try to lead his people to the truth as he sees it?
4. Does incompatibility of temper ever reach a point justifying divorce?
5. In view of the fact that Paul withstood Peter "because he was to be blamed" (Gal. 2:11), may we regard both men as inspired?

Questions of the Week

1. Is it right for a Christian to make plans for the future, or should one live simply from day to day?

The Christian should "make plans for the future," and he should also "live simply from day to day." He should make plans; otherwise his life will be an aimless life, and an aimless life tends more or less to be a useless life. At the same time, in childlike trust, he should live from day to day, taking no thought, that is no anxious thought, for the morrow. Some plans we must make, or we shall simply drift. If we are to reap, we must lay plans for the sowing. If others are dependent on us, we must plan for their maintenance and their welfare. Whatever good we aim at, there must be the wise planning for its attainment. But in all this planning we are to say, "If the Lord will." Deeply conscious that the future is wrapped in utter uncertainty, we are to trust him to lead us day by day. Assured that he will mete out our daily bread for body and for soul, "our anxieties are to be bounded by the horizon of nightfall." AMELIA HOYT.

There are two passages of Scripture that seem to be contradictory of each other, but yet, examining and comparing them in the light of reason and common sense, we find a true guide for Christian living, as regards the problem here presented. In one passage it is said that he that provideth not for his own is worse than an infidel. In the other, Christians are enjoined to take no thought for the morrow. In the first of these passages, it is plain that it is the Christian's duty to be industrious and to make temporal provision for the future. In the second, the Saviour warns Christians not to give way to undue anxiety and worry. There are some things that are beyond human power to control, and worry over them is not only useless but sinful. When one has done everything reasonable to fulfil his duty in the matter of provision for the future, he should lay aside anxiety and worry and leave it all with God. This, however, should not lead him into the extreme practiced by the shiftless and worthless, who, by their course in life, bring upon themselves want and misery. L. T. RIGHTSELL.

2. Should we encourage a person to go to church who apparently derives no benefit, but seems to go to criticize and find fault?

It is undoubtedly an affliction to a sensitive Christian, whose soul is filled with a loving reverence for the house of God, to have constantly thrust upon him the jeering criticisms of an unbeliever; but considered in the light of a cross to be borne for his sake, we should resign ourselves to it, and, by all possible means, encourage the unbelievers to attend divine service, no matter what their object may be in doing so. "They came to scoff, but remained to pray," is descriptive of many conversions. We have no means of judging of the condition of the soil upon which God's Word shall fall, so that we can only do our utmost to bring all whom we can under the blessed influence of the Gospel, trusting in God for the result. IDA EFFINGER.

The Church does not exist for its own sake, but to help others. The person described above, whether he realizes it or not, needs help—such help as the Church alone can give. We should encourage all such to come, then. 1. Because it is our duty. We realize something of his need and danger, as also of the benefits to be derived from Church association. 2. He has a spiritual nature and is liable to be touched at any time. 3. Unknown to us his soul may be carried up to God's throne on the swelling tide of some song a loved one used to sing. 4. Difficulties may be explained, good seed sown that shall bear fruit in after years, or even sudden light may burst in upon him, as in the case of Paul, the Ethiopian eunuch, the Philippian jailer, and a host of others. 5. Your thoughtfulness and brotherly interest may yet win him. "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." R. E. HOUGH.

3. Who was the greatest of America's poets and why?

The palm of popularity is claimed for John Greenleaf Whittier. His poems were pure, tender, humane songs, ennobling and inspiring. "For fifty years he was a bard arousing patriotism and humane emotion, cheering, soothing, and charming with tender ballad and romantic lyric," exhibiting throughout all his poems the same unchanging quality of graphic simplicity and deep and catholic feeling; the same penetrating pathos and New England vigor. He was esteemed and publicly honored, sometimes styled a "God-made poet." The distinguished James T. Brady said, "My poet of poets is Whittier," and John Bright publicly expressed his regard. Though silent, shy, and a peace-loving Quaker, he roused the public sentiment against slavery. His voice rang through the land to cheer, animate, uplift, warn and denounce, "urging host to battle." Every word was a blow. An evidence of his popularity was shown by the fact that the newspapers gathered and printed in garlands, poems sent him by other famous poets on his seventieth birthday. H. F. BROCKETT.

Judged by the highest standards, Thanatopsis, by William Cullen Bryant, is incomparably the greatest American poem. Judged by the ordinary standards of popular esteem, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow has a higher place in the affections of our people than any other American poet. He has written more that has come closer to the hearts and sympathies of general readers than any of his contemporaries on this side of the ocean. Bryant, Whittier and Lowell, and perhaps one or two other poets, may have achieved higher flights, but the palm of popularity rests with the author of Evangeline and Hiawatha. MARIA AYLMER.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow is generally esteemed the best representative of American poets. We have others who surpass him in certain respects, as Whittier, in homely wisdom and rugged strength; Poe, in full musical utterance; Lowell, in artistic finish, but none who have left us so mature a body of poetical writings, so consistent in range and development, and so well adapted to the use of men in the "every day" of life. The pioneer of American poetry, Longfellow, has done much for us, and many of his best poems, such as Evangeline, Hiawatha and The Courtship of Miles Standish, treat of subjects and legends distinctly American, thus tending to build up characteristic traits in the young literature of the West. He has also assimilated in his writings the best of English thought, in both substance and mode. There is no purer poet in our land, none who is oftener quoted, recited, and read; none more universally a favorite. HELEN E. MALONE.

[Among the letters received in answer to this question, some writers preferred Whittier, Emerson, Lowell, Bryant and Poe. Longfellow, however, received a large majority of the vote.]

4. If it is right to deny one's self in order to save money for Christ's cause, should one deny one's self all pleasure involving expenditure, or where should the line be drawn?

If one is a Christian all he has belongs to God, and everything—time, talents, money—should be used for Christ's cause. What is spent on one's self, if wisely and prayerfully spent, is spent for Christ's cause. One eats that he may work, studies that he may be wise and intelligent, he prays that he may become strong in the Lord. It takes money for food and clothing and books. It would be unwise to deny one's self food that the body needs, in order to give the money to the church. So pleasure may be what the tired body and weary brain need. If so, it should be taken with a clear conscience. But one may eat, dress and spend too much on self. One may take too much pleasure. If one can deny himself and not injure himself, he should do so for the cause of Christ. Col. 3:17 is a good rule for any one. Try it. B. A. HODGES.

Draw the line straight across all pleasures that do not either directly or indirectly help and improve your condition in life and leave in your soul an enlarged charity, and a happy, restful increase of faith. To deny one's self for the advancement of Christ's kingdom is one of the Christian's greatest privileges, and money saved through sacrifice brings into this life a double blessing. It is a treasure laid up in heaven. Any expenditure that tends to the betterment of the home is right. Christian civilization and the final redemption of the world depends upon the individual home, and the refinement and education that comes into the home by the expenditure for books, music and art are the Christian's by right. But any expenditure for pleasures that does not bring the heart nearer to God is not as Christ would do, therefore is wrong. ISABEL CARPENTER.

5. What is the best way of dealing with Mormon emissaries who invade a community to break down its morality and make proselytes?

The press and the pulpit are to-day the most potent factors in the denunciation of great evils. See that the editor of your local paper is thoroughly aroused to the mischief that these false teachers may accomplish. The pastors of various churches in each community should unite in a concerted effort to set public sentiment squarely against such infamy, and should particularly give the matter special attention from their pulpits. If not supplied with late information as to what the Mormon Church is doing, let each pastor write to his Home Board for it. CHARLES AUGUR.

[To these suggestions we would add: All editors, pastors and interested members of Mormon-invaded communities should write to Gen. John Eaton, The Concord, Washington, D. C., and to Rev. John D. Nutting, 739 Republic street, Cleveland, O., for anti-Mormon literature, and distribute it widely throughout the district. It will prove a most effective method of enlightening the public and counteracting Mormon influence.—ED.]

Deal with them kindly but firmly. Give them straight truth, but do not engage in a public wrangle or angry debate. Give them no countenance in the public services of our churches. Where one is skillful enough to ask them questions so as to get them to contradict themselves, as was done in Alumbank, Pa., lately, it has a good effect on the public mind. Give them no entertainment. Treat them with silent contempt and quiet indifference and the place will soon be not only too hot, but also too cool to hold them long. This is the treatment we accorded them, and they soon shifted to "pastures new." (REV.) F. J. STRAYER.

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. C. W., Easton, Minn. Are mushrooms really nutritious and valuable as food?

"The flesh of the mushroom," says W. H. Gibson, in his interesting book, Our Edible Toadstools and Mushrooms, "possesses the same nourishing properties as meat. In certain sections of France, Germany, Russia and Italy, peasants often go for weeks without other animal food. What a plentiful, spontaneous feasting goes begging in our woods and fields!" His rules for discarding poisonous varieties are: 1. Exclude every mushroom having a cup or socket, or suggestion of cup or socket at base of stem—examine carefully, such cup or socket may be hidden underground. 2. Exclude those having unpleasant odor, or a peppery, bitter or unpalatable taste or a tough consistency. 3. Exclude those infested with worms or in advanced age or any stage of decay. Ordinary precautions are: 1. Never bring a suspicious variety in contact with those that have passed these tests. 2. The common sense rule, that vegetables should be gathered at their best and cooked and eaten as soon thereafter as possible, applies with equal force to mushrooms. Quite a number of tests have been given by various authors; and a thorough study of the subject should be undertaken by all who mean to gather mushrooms for their tables, as the consequence of eating poisonous varieties is sometimes very serious.

Thos. J. N., Amite City, La. 1. Are the Mormons planting a colony in Mexico, or elsewhere outside of Utah? 2. Is polygamy practised in that colony? If it is, what about the resolution prohibiting its practice?

1. Yes; we understand they have secured a large tract of land in Mexico, and have already planted a good-sized colony there. 2. Not openly, we believe; although the doctrine is still held, and very likely practised in secret.

Byron B., Lincoln, Neb. Is it contrary to the letter or spirit of the Gospel for ministers of the Gospel to receive such titles as D.D., Ph.D., LL.D., etc.? Does the passage, "Be ye called rabbi, for one is your Master even Christ, and all ye are brethren," forbid it? Would ministers seek such titles? A minister here has raised these questions and I would like to hear them answered.

Although they may be justly entitled to these distinctions, having acquired them in the usual way in which degrees are conferred by our institutions of learning, it is not customary for ministers to use them in their intercourse with their congregation, or in any spirit of vain-glory. They are simply the credentials that testify to his ability in those studies which are considered essential to the intellectual equipment of a man of superior theological training, and are entirely honorable in themselves. There are occasions, too, when they may be used with propriety in authorship, etc. There is no reason why they should ever be regarded as objectionable, if used with good judgment or in the proper place. We do not consider it good taste to have them on a visiting card or to use them in correspondence.

Mrs. W. S. F., Shreveport, La. 1. Will you please tell me where the mosquito comes from. Do they develop from the so-called "Wiggle-tails," or do they come from an egg? 2. I have heard that a mosquito cannot sing and that its humming is made by his wings. Can this be so?

1. "Wiggle-tails" are incipient or baby-mosquitoes—that is, they are the larvæ hatched from the eggs which the mosquito deposits on the surface of water. When the perfect insect appears, it uses the shell which has shed as a floating foothold until its wings are strong enough for flight. 2. The "humming" is made by the rapid motion of the wings; it is estimated that a mosquito's wings vibrate 3,000 times a minute.

Mrs. L. H. B., Brunswick, Me. See Isa. 23. Kallona, K. S., Dinuba, Calif. It depends upon the point of view. Some might be greatest in literature, others in philosophy, medicine, law, statesmanship, etc., etc.

W. H. McD., Berwyn, O. It would be better proper for him to open with a suitable Bible reading and a simple, evangelical prayer; or have the pupils repeat the Lord's Prayer in unison.

Isaac H., Bristol, O. If he sincerely loves that such things are detrimental to the spiritual growth of the church, he should preach against them. On no account should he desert his flock.

Mrs. G. S., San Angelo, Tex. The description in your letter is certainly not that of a Christian, but being ignorant of the facts in the case, I can express no opinion. Better see your pastor on the subject.

Reader, North Billerica, Mass. 1. Yeat is wrong. 2. The doctrine is not taught now. 3. If he can give it the time without hampering himself otherwise. 4. It is a doubtful pleasure at best, and should be avoided.

Julia F., Rushville, N. Y. Among the advantages of incorporation are these: it enables a corporation to hold property and to sue and transmit a valid title, and it enables a person to sue or to defend any action at law brought against it.

Allan R., Quebec. No matter what other may have done, it is your duty to act honorably. Two wrongs do not make a right. You are entitled, however, to let him know what you have learned in the matter, and how you have suffered loss through his deception.

A. A. A., Groton, Conn. Where a congregation can erect a substantial and satisfactory building for $12,000, and has the money, it would seem to be a doubtful policy to incur a heavy debt on much more expensive building, merely for the sake of show. A church in debt is, generally speaking, hampered in its spiritual work by that fact, which always comes uppermost, even at the most inopportune times.

THE BITTER FRUIT OF ENVY ~ Joseph Sold Into Egypt

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCTOBER 6TH.
GENESIS 37: 12-36

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT: "THE PATRIARCHS, MOVED WITH ENVY, SOLD JOSEPH INTO EGYPT; BUT GOD WAS WITH HIM." ACTS 7: 9

The Lesson Story

JOSEPH was born in the house of his grandfather, Laban, and being the first born of the beloved Rachel, was in a peculiar sense the favorite child of his father, Jacob. At the time of Jacob's return to Canaan, when occurred the wrestling at the brook Jabbok, Joseph was probably about seven years old. It was shortly after this that Benjamin was born. When Rachel descended to the mysterious motherland she never came back, the babe came alone. It is recorded that "Rachel died," not until she had named her child "Ben-oni," "son of my row." Jacob afterwards gave him the name of Benjamin, signifying "son of my right hand," changing the minor key of the boy's life to the gladness of hope. Joseph and Benjamin were all in all to each other. Joseph's tender feeling for his little brother, his very own brother, not half brother, the other ten sons were, was not broken by passing years by change of environment, as we shall see in later lessons. The first years of Joseph's life were spent among the very people from whom God had called Abraham. Again God called to call his chosen family to come out from among these nations, to whom Jacob had fled from home on account of the wrong he had done Esau. Undoubtedly the older sons of Jacob, having lived among idolatrous people during the formative period of their lives, developed traits which made their cruel treatment of their brother possible. Jacob's peculiar love of Joseph, together with the favor shown him by his father in the gift of the coat of many colors, which was an indication that he was to be his father's heir, and chief of the tribe, caused in these less worthy brothers feelings of envy and hatred that at last grew to murder in the desire to kill their brother. The opportunity to do this came one day when Joseph came to Dothan, where they were tending their flocks, having been sent by his father from Hebron, the family home, seventy miles away, to carry them some food, and to inquire about their welfare. When they saw him coming, they conceived their devilish plan to cast him into a pit, which was probably a broken, dry cistern. They would have killed him outright but that one of the brothers, Reuben, somewhat less cruel than the others, proposed the pit, intending afterwards to deliver him. He was not brave enough to assist their plot openly. Or was it wiser, he was one against nine, to use the strategy he did? The baseness of the other big brothers is seen in that immediately after they had thrown their brother into the pit, they sat down together to partake of a meal. While they were eating they saw a caravan of merchantmen in the distance, their camels laden with spices, on their way to Egypt. Judah, one of the others, proposed that they take Joseph out of the pit and sell him to the merchants. He saw that this plan would be more profitable and more merciful at once. The theme met with favor, and the price received was soon in their hands, aggregating about $1.10 each. Their work was done, excepting to send to their father Joseph's coat, dipped in a goat's blood, that they might make him think that Joseph had been devoured by an evil beast.

Application and Illustration

The patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph. Joseph was more beloved, partly, at least, because more worthy. This afforded ground for pride on his part—and there is no proof he had any—but only for thanksgiving. When one is better than another in character he may usually find the reason partly, as we can in the case of Joseph, in more favorable surroundings. When older brothers were shaping their characters they were in a land of idols, and their father was unduly absorbed in money-making. Joseph, from the age of seven, had lived in Hebron, beside God's altar, with his grandfather, Isaac, and his grandmother, Rebekah, to teach him about God, as well as his father, Jacob, who had become a more godly man since he met the mysterious wrestler at Jabbok. "Each nation and each individual is so dependent upon the events before and around, that all state or personal vanity is excluded, and no noble feeling dare remain but that of gratitude to the King of kings."

Joseph's own will, however, co-operated with environment in his development of character. Heredity, environment, will—the greatest of these is will. At seventeen he was already a brave moral reformer. He reported the crimes and vices of his brothers, the incest of Reuben, the murders of Levi and Simon, not, surely, in the spirit of a tale-bearer, but prompted by the indignation that robust righteousness always feels at the sight of sin, and also by a desire to reform his brothers. A like case is that of Captain Hobson, of the United States Navy, who, when a student at Annapolis, reported vicious violations of the Naval Academy rules by his fellow students. His whole class called him a "tattler," and refused to speak to him. After a year or two, overcome by his sterling worth as a Christian gentleman, they made overtures for renewed fellowship, which he politely refused. It takes rare courage to break the false code of honor, still in force, that those who wrong society by evil doing, may not be reported, though it would be for the general good, and even for their own.

The envy of Joseph's brother was due as much to his nobler character as to the greater favor it had won from their father. It was like Cain's envy of Abel, and Saul's envy of David. Sunday School teachers, and even preachers, sometimes blame Jacob for "partiality." If his favors bestowed on Joseph had not been based on superior worth there might be room for criticism. In awarding the rainbow coat Jacob was appointing a successor, not by favoritism, but by merit, as civil service reformers advocate we should always do. There was therefore no justification of their envy. It is said, "We never envy what we can equal."

When Jenny Lind was a young girl, so the story goes, she was given a trial hearing before the manager of the Grand Opera and his favorite prima donna in Paris. When her song was ended the haughty prima donna, perhaps actuated by a jealous fear, whispered a word to the manager, who then in a few polite phrases told the "young singer" that her voice was unfitted to the requirements of the great establishment. She heard him in silence and then quietly said, "I bid you adieu, Monsieur. One day you will implore me to return, but I never will return. I shall never sing again in Paris." She was true to her word, when, a few years later, her popularity and reputation were so great that Parisian lie. Thus do those who commit great crimes without compunction boast of small and fictitious virtues. But can one tell a lie in any other way than by words? When this question was asked in teaching this lesson publicly to a crowd of children, one boy answered: "Yes, they can lie on their backs." There was a titter in the audience at what seemed the teacher's discomfiture, but she quickly said: "Yes, many a man lies on his back by wearing better clothes than he can pay for, just as Joseph's brothers lied by the bloody coat." Actions lie louder than words.

Yet another bitter grape the brothers tasted years after—remorse—recalling the sale of their brother when, in an Egyptian prison, as if it had been of yesterday: "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us and we would not hear." "He who indulges in enmity is like one who throws ashes to windward, which come back to the same place and cover him all over." Let us not forget that every man is our brother, and that we may wrong these brothers not alone by envy, but also by neglect, and especially by selling them in modern ways into slavery for our own gain.

Is it worth while that we jostle a brother, Bearing his load on the rough road of life?

Here is a story which might appropriately have been told to Joseph's envious brothers who wanted their years counted Weight of rather than their characters Character weighed in determining who should be first. A little boy was on the scales, and, being very anxious to outweigh his playmate, he puffed out his cheeks and swelled up like a little frog. But the playmate was the wiser boy. "Oho!" he cried, in scorn, "that doesn't do any good; you can only weigh what you are!"

With God, at any rate, nothing weighs but character. Years and titles and money are but puffed cheeks in his sight.

But God was with him. We have viewed the story on the dark side from the point of view of the brother's sin. Now Behind we turn to the seemingly a Frowning darker, yet really brighter side Providence of Joseph's sorrow. In a vision of a full-orbed sun, to which the moon and stars made obeisance, and of a golden sheaf to which other sheaves bowed down, God had pictured his glorious future as that of one to whom others should bow. What a shock to his faith it must have been that God, as well as his brothers, should seem to disregard "the anguish of his soul" when he besought God and man in vain to save him from slavery. In reality we know this sorrow was the first step in the providential fulfilment of his dream. God was making the wrath of man to praise him and to serve his purposes. Joseph lost a child's coat that he might wear a royal robe. He became a slave that he might be a ruler. The English translation of the Bible used by the Jews renders the passage we translate, "The Lord was with Joseph and he was a prosperous man." "The Lord was with Joseph and he was a lucky fellow." It would have seemed mockery to tell the weeping Joseph, sold by cruel brothers into slavery, that he was "a lucky fellow," but that caravan was God's escort to transport him to his kingdom. Such a story helps us to understand how "all things work together for good to them that love God." Even hate, as well as love, serves their cause.

It is generally supposed by the Egyptologists that Joseph was sold into Egypt during the reign of the "shepherd kings" (Hyksos), a foreign dynasty who invaded the country from the north (although their origin and race is as yet uncertain), dispossessed the native kings of Lower Egypt, and held dominion there, perhaps, five or six centuries, when they were driven out by a native dynasty. This alien line of kings maintained itself with difficulty against the native princes who still held Upper Egypt, being hated by the Egyptian people, and ever ready, therefore, to form alliances with foreigners. The native Egyptians, on the other hand, were remarkably exclusive, having strong prejudices, and even hatred and contempt for foreigners. The monumental literature of Egypt shows this intense antipathy to foreigners in a thousand forms. The wonderful and more than romantic history of Joseph could not have taken place under the native Pharaohs. A foreigner could not, under the native Egyptian rule, have been elevated to the second place of authority, nor could families of foreigners have been welcomed, as were the families of Israel, to settle in the kingdom (Poole in Smith's Dict.) Here then, in this Hyksos invasion, and possession of Egypt, during the time that the three great patriarchs were roaming through Palestine, we find a providential preparation for the Egyptian period of the history of the people.

"An evil beast hath devoured him," said Jacob, mourning over his son's bloody coat. Aye, it was the deed of beasts in human form that wrong to father and brother. And it is such beasts that still break the hearts of fathers and mothers by selling sons and daughters into slavery to sin.

That full-orbed sun of Joseph's dream pictured his full manhood. The first step toward such a manhood was the high ideal of it he accepted from God. Many sneer at ideals, but there is no noble life that was not such first in purpose and ideal. "We must steer by the stars." If you dream of greatness, you may fail of it; but a dream of goodness you may realize. "Not all have gifts, but all may have graces."

managers begged her to sing for them on any terms she might choose to name.

The envy of Joseph's brothers soon grew to hatred, which speedily illustrated Christ's words, "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." All, save one, were ready to kill him when he had come seventy miles to bring them their father's gift and message.

Envy's wild grapes include not only hatred but cowardice. Reuben, though envious, desired to prevent murder, but went about it timidly; and Judah, also, when he at length attempted the same thing. Another grape in envy's bitter cluster is cruelty, seen in the feast of revenge of Joseph's brothers as they "sat down to eat bread" after bottling their young brother in the cistern to die by starvation. Spenser, in his "Faerie Queen," pictures envy riding upon a ravenous wolf.

Death it was when any good lies twi,
But when he heard of him he waxed wondrous glad.

Pollock, in his "Course of Time," says of envy, "His joy was woe—the woe of others."

Yet another of envy's wild grapes is falsehood.

When Joseph's brethren sent the bloody coat to Jacob, they did not say, in so many words, that an evil beast had killed him. They probably prided themselves on avoiding

GEMS FROM THE WORLD'S GREAT PULPITS

Living Thoughts from the Recent Sermons of Eminent Preachers of Many Denominations

A DASTARDLY CRIME

REV. HUGH BLACK, OF EDINBURGH, IN THE AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, NEW YORK

I FEEL called upon to express somewhat of your feelings and your sympathy and to lead your prayers for President McKinley, who is the victim of such a dastardly crime. Though a stranger to your country, it is easy for me to do this, since it needs no local knowledge of politics, but merely the expression of the universal heart of man. As for the deed itself, the whole civilized world must pronounce abhorrence not only of the act, but of the detestable principles which inspired it. Nowhere outside of America, moreover, will sorrow be keener or prayer be more fervent than in Great Britain, where your President is admired as a man and honored as the head of this great nation, with whom we are proud to claim kinship. The President is regarded personally with confidence and esteem for his character, and I am sure that in this moment of your anxiety and sorrow as a people you have the sincere sympathy of every subject of the British Empire. It is in such trials that we feel how near we are in mind and spirit as we make our common prayer to our common Lord.

THE POISON OF ANARCHY

DR. STEPHEN A. NORTHROP, FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, KANSAS CITY, MO.

COLD blooded assassinations of the innocent are the shame and dishonor of our times. Such conspiracies are born of hell. The blackest crimes pale before the satanic wickedness of that red hand and black heart that shot down our chief executive. The attempts of these assassins are the most frightful signs of our time. In their aimless malignity, in their atrocious recklessness, in their brutal hatred, in their license of civil liberty, these are the crimes not of men but of human fiends.

Juvenal was distressed because the Syrian Orentes flowed into the Tiber and brought with it its language and morals. So our American waters are poisoned by many an Orentes of the Old World. America is becoming more and more the dumping ground of the vilest offscourings of Russia, Italy and Poland. Organized mobocracy, anarchistic leagues, communistic hordes, are daily and nightly introducing their revolutionary schemes into our body politic. From market place and public rostrum and incendiary press they spit their venom against our blood-bought institutions, and not a word is said. Meetings occur every Lord's day right under the shadow of our churches for the promulgation of plots against a free government.

These foreign radicals who never knew the first principles of freedom, welcomed to our shores by the voice of Liberty, have come here to assail our government, undermine our Constitution, and assassinate our Presidents. Are they to be permitted to keep up their nefarious work? Are they to be allowed to dog the steps of our statesmen from city to city, and make Liberty to hang her head in sackcloth and ashes? Do we, for a moment, imagine that our publicists, preachers, and statesmen can assimilate this agglomerated conglomeration of anarchy into our national life? You may make men out of monkeys by the laws of Darwin, but you cannot make Anarchists into law-abiding, liberty-loving citizens. God can do it, but the task is too great for man.

A NOBLE LIFE ENDED

DR. REESE F. ALSOP, ST. ANN'S CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

IT is singular how frequently great leaders of men, shapers of human history, die as Moses did, before the final triumph. They have a vision of great things to come for their nation or their race, things toward which they themselves have wrought, but their feet stop on the threshold. We think of the great Julius Caesar. He saw and longed for the unity and peace brought in later by his nephew, Octavius, a peace which blessed the Roman world for centuries. Yes, he saw it, but to him it was said, "Thou shalt not pass over." The dagger of assassins and conspirators found him and let out his great soul.

We come down to modern times. Henry IV. of France had a vision of a sort of United States of Europe, not yet realized, but still thought of and hoped for. Ravaillac, a wild, bigoted Jesuit, forbade him to go over thither. We go a little to the north, and we are in the presence of William of Orange, at the head of the revolted Netherlands, wise, unselfish, brave; seeing ahead what? A land of liberty of mind and conscience. He saw it with his eyes, yea, he led his people toward it, but he was forbidden to pass over. Another Jesuit robbed his people of a splendid life. Time forbids me to dwell upon the names and deeds of others. We think of the Czar of Russia, who saw in a vision the beauty of freedom, and who set free millions of serfs, and was rewarded for it by death at the hands of those who called themselves freedom's friends.

We come to our own Lincoln, our second Washington, the great soul who for more than four years bore the burden of a great conflict, then, just as he caught the vision, lo! the sentence borne on the bullet of an assassin. We think of Carnot, President of the French Republic; of the liberal prime minister of Spain, of Garfield, and now at last of McKinley, and our hearts are sad for him, for the nation, for ourselves, that the head of the great nation has thus been smitten. For the craven heart that could form such a purpose against such a man, for the dastard hand that could carry it out, we have only indignation and loathing.

REV. HUGH BLACK

Assistant Pastor of Free St. George's Church, Edinburgh

But what are we to say of such departures? Under Providence what do they mean?

As we wait for an answer this thought comes to us. The best, greatest, purest man that ever lived was taken and slain by wicked hands. He suffered not for himself. What in vision he saw his death helped to bring in. May it not be so with others? Their death is vicarious. It is not only on the battlefield that a man dies for his country. He does it when in any high place of duty he falls. President McKinley was doing hard duty. The day before he was stricken he told the nation something of what he had seen on his mount of vision, as he took a wider outlook and the horizon receded to the ends of the earth, and then came the doom. Such sacrifices cannot be wholly in vain. Somehow things must work out blessing for the nation.

A BLOW AT LIBERTY

REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL, BECKMAN HILL M. E. CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

WHEN the news was brought that President McKinley had been shot by an Anarchist, the whole civilized world felt the thrill of terror. Can it be that an irresponsible, worthless villain can overthrow the head of a nation, and subvert the wishes of seventy millions of people? The blow was struck to assassinate the principles lying at the foundation of the Republic. Those principles were entrusted to the hands of William McKinley. He stood for all that was American, for the grandest government on God's footstool. In order to strike at our ideas of law, justice and liberty the President must fall. The Anarchists of to-day, so far as they are concerned, have done away with God, and, therefore, with conscience, with the sense of right and wrong, which therefore fits them for the perpetration of infamous crimes, like this attempt to murder the President. They have no more use for a republic than a monarchy. They would carry society back to savagery, where each man is compelled to defend his little property alone. We can say, as the lamented Garfield said, when the heroic Lincoln fell: "Clouds and darkness are round about him; righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives." Czolgosz said: "I have struck a blow for liberty as we understand it." O Liberty, what crimes have been perpetrated in thy name!

POWER IN CHARACTER

DR. H. F. DEWEY, CHURCH OF THE PILGRIMS BROOKLYN, N. Y.

WHAT is character? Here is a piece of wood. We speak of its character, and we mean the quality of the wood, what the wood really is. Here is a piece of steel, and we speak of its character, meaning the quality of the steel, what it really is. Here are men and women. We speak of their domestic character, their social character, their business character, and we mean the quality of these persons in these respects, what they really are. Character is then not doing something, not saying something. Character is something else back of the words and back of the deeds which is revealed through them, and which brings them into existence. Character is being, and from that inner, indescribable but real self there is proceeding continually a force which is to those about us as tonic or poison, as blessing or curse. It is a very important thing then to have a good character. Important because it is a valuable thing in itself. Important because it has much influence upon other lives.

THE CITY CHURCH

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, NORTHFIELD, MA.

WHAT is the responsibility of the church in the city? What does the Church of Christ exist for? For the select few who to-day worship within the buildings called by his name? That is God's name close the doors! Such churches have no mission and should cease to exist. The Church of Christ exists to reveal God and to act in concert with him. Would that I could startle you to Christian activity! The sorrow of the city awaits your sympathy, and the saving force and grace of Jesus Christ. How is the city to know that it is not God-forsaken? Through the Church. Let me speak plainly. If you are careless of the city's sorrow, you are not a Christian. Call yours a cultured pagan if you will, but do not use the name Christian. If you are not pitying the city, you are a God-forsaken soul, and need the pity of the greater soul.

THE SOURCE OF SPIRITUAL LIFE

REV. HENRY C. MINTON, D.D., SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

OUR Lord said to Nicodemus that "except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"; and when the man of the Pharisees marveled, the great Teacher likened the subtle workings of the Spirit to the wind that bloweth where it listeth, but we cannot tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth. The Divine Spirit is the author of that stupendous second birth. "All life from life," science says; and so also says the Gospel of the new birth. The Holy Spirit is the spiritual Life-giver. He is the moving, molding, controlling force in the re-creation of character and in the salvation of the world. He fashions the life and endows the heart with the graces of the Spirit. He breathes upon the dry bones of a dead world and vivifies, sustains, guides, glorifies, and glorifies every soul into which the life-bearing inspiration enters. His work is indispensable, and his work is deep, subtle, penetrating, myriad-sided, effective, and transforming. This great truth is the basis of evangelical Christianity.

CHARACTER BUILDING

BY DR. R. G. HUTCHINS, FOSTORIA, O.

CAN a man construct the character of his choice? Not the poisoned blood of a bad ancestry some course through the arteries like liquid flame, and kindles in the soul which shall light its endless burnings? Does temperament foreordain, with a changeless fixedness, a man's history and destiny? Do not wretched surroundings in infancy and childhood sometimes fence men within the horrible pit and miry clay? Does not the accident of wealth or poverty deliver or doom? Are not our characters fashioned inevitably by our environment, as our clothes are fashioned by the tailor? It is true that there are apparent suggestions of fatalism in the strength of the influences which surround us. But he of all men is doomed who yields himself up as the victim of fate. God makes some men delve in hard mines, but even there it is possible to garner gold and silver and precious stones and marbles, the materials of which palaces are built. Whereas, even amidst the utmost opulence of privilege and opportunity, a man may, if he be bent on it, collect wood, hay and stubble, the materials of which hovels are built.

CHRIST AS A CITIZEN

DR. TEUNIS S. HAMLIN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

IT is very striking to notice that our Lord did not touch social and political abuses of his day directly. The lived certainly under one of the worst governments, one of the most oppressive governments, most tyrannical, arbitrary, most personal, that the world has ever seen. He organized no revolution, and yet he gave the principles which gradually have almost obliterated that type of government from the earth, which have obliterated it wherever the Gospel has gone and even partially prevailed. But it is very interesting and striking and instructive to notice that the Lord said, "Give Caesar his due; pay the tax," and that he who followed him, interpreting his teaching, required obedience to constituted authority, and though the constituted authority had very much that might be said against it, and was in very many things very offensive to justice and conscience, nevertheless the claim is that we should honor the king, we should pray for those who are in authority, that we should be patriotic and obedient citizens. Ministers are constantly tempted to leave the ordinary and as I would say, the mate work of their calling, to attempt to set right the wrongs that are all about us in the world. There is no doubt of the pressing nature of these social problems. There is no doubt that Christianity has a relation to them. There is no doubt that the Church has a duty in the matter. But does not the example of our Lord throw some light upon the nature of that duty and upon the way in which it is to be performed?

THE DUNGEON WHERE CZOLGOSZ WAS CONFINED IN BUFFALO

JUDGE CHILDS, OF ERIE
Before whom Czolgosz will be arraigned

AFTER a week of alternate hopes and fears, President McKinley, who was shot by the Anarchist assassin Czolgosz, on September 6, passed away at 2.15 A. M. on September 14.

He was never moved from the room in the Milburn house in Buffalo, into which he was carried on the day of the shooting and immediately after the operation. He carries with him to the grave the second bullet, which was not extracted. His last moments were calm and peaceful. Several members of the Cabinet, a number of relatives and personal friends, and practically the entire medical staff, were in attendance when the end came.

President McKinley died as he had lived—a brave man and a Christian. He had lapsed into unconsciousness at 6.40 P. M., but was revived somewhat half an hour later. During the evening he had brief periods of unconsciousness, and in the intervals, his thoughts were rambling and he was slightly delirious. He spoke much of the old home at Canton; he longed to go back there—he wanted to rest. About 7 o'clock he asked for his wife. When she entered the chamber, the President was fully conscious.

She had been weeping, but was now calm, and she bent over and kissed her husband tenderly on the forehead. Turning to Dr. Rixey, who stood beside her, she said: "I know you will save him. I cannot let him go. The country cannot spare him." Their hands met in a parting clasp—a sad parting, from which those who stood near turned away, respecting it as too sacred for curious eyes. For a moment her head was bowed, and she sobbed quietly beside him. Still holding her hand, he said faintly:

Parting Words to his Wife

"Bear up, Ida. It is God's way. His will, not ours be done."

She saw him again between 11 and 12 o'clock, but was not present at the end. The President's last audible words, as written down by Dr. Mann, who stood by his bedside, were: "Good-bye all; good-bye. God's will, not ours be done." His relatives, friends, and members of the Cabinet were admitted to the sick room and took their leave of the dying President several hours before the final scene.

Throughout the President's illness, special bulletins, supplied by Secretary Cortelyou, were received at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and these constitute the most authentic record of the last days William McKinley passed on earth.

This was the last bulletin, which brought the official announcement of death:

There is no more pathetic chapter in American history than that which deals with the President's battle for life, part of which has already been told in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. With Czolgosz, the assassin, secure in jail, and the wounded President apparently making rapid progress toward complete recovery, the hopes of the nation rose, and it in the brightest anticipations. Frequent bulletins issued from the sick-room gave abundant grounds for encouragement. Sunday and Monday, Sept. 8 and 9, were days of cheering progress. Monday night was marked by restlessness on the part of the sufferer, yet he slept fairly well, and his general condition on Tuesday morning was satisfactory, pulse being 120, temperature 101, respiration 28. At eight o'clock A. M. Dr. Park said: "We are all very cheerful over the outlook." Dr. Mann declared: "The President is exceptionally well," and Dr. McBurney also recorded his entire satisfaction with the President's condition.

On Monday forenoon, there was a steady stream of callers at the Milburn house. They found every one in the household cheerful and happy. Senator Hanna was radiant with hopeful smiles, and Governor McKinley, the President's brother, expressed his confidence in the latter's recovery. Vice-President Roosevelt heartily expressed himself as "absolutely confident that everything will come out all right." Mrs. McKinley went out driving in the afternoon. All the bulletins issued were notes of progress. Secretaries Gage and Knox prepared to return to Washington. All felt assured of the patient's early recovery, and the whole country breathed easier.

Delusive Hopes

On Tuesday, September 10, the early bulletin recorded a continuance of the favorable conditions. "The President has passed the most comfortable night," it said, "since the attempt on his life. Pulse 118, temperature 100.4, respiration 28. Dr. McBurney ventured the prediction that 'the President would be at his desk within the next six weeks.' Nourishment was administered to the sufferer by injection, as had been done at intervals since Sunday. No one save the doctors and nurses were admitted to the sick room, the only exception being Mrs. McKinley, who was permitted to see her husband for a moment occasionally. She was bearing up admirably, and showed no signs of breaking down as the doctor had feared. These meetings seemed to comfort Mr. McKinley greatly.

Wednesday, September 11, was both a day brilliant with hope and encouragement. The President had passed a comfortable night, and all the news from the sick chamber was gratifying; the wound was healing healthily; the quota of nourishment was being increased, and the patient was surely gaining. On the previous night, two stitches in the wound had been cut, and the wound itself reopened sufficiently to admit of removing a shred of clothing which the bullet had carried with it, and which was causing a slight local irritation. This seemed or "irritating atom" had somehow been overlooked in dressing the wound originally. Benefit had resulted from the new dressing, and the release of a small secretion of serum. Healthy appetite was developing, and the stomach was tolerating the beef juice, which was being administered in increasing quantities. An X-ray machine had been forwarded by Mr. Edison, and Dr. Herman Knoll, an expert, arrived for the special purpose of determining the exact location of the missing bullet, but it was not deemed advisable to trouble the patient, especially as he was making such excellent progress.

More Optimistic Bulletins

Thursday, September 12., was a repetition of the cheering news of the previous days. At 6.20 A.M. the morning bulletin announced "a comfortable night; pulse 122, temperature 100.2." The President's sleep was quiet and restful. Dr. Mynter said, on leaving the Milburn house: "He is doing excellently—so well, in fact, that this morning we were able to give him solid food. His breakfast consisted of half a cup of beef tea, some toast, a cup of coffee, and a little whiskey." This was all eaten in the regular way, and the invalid seemed to relish it keenly, and even asked for more. His physicians were apparently delighted with his general condition. Dr. McBurney said: "I am sure that he is out of danger, and I shall leave the city to-day. I am leaving on private business and will return in a few days." So general was this feeling of confidence that the crisis was over, that others, including Secretaries Hay and Root, Postmaster-General Smith, and some of the President's relatives, prepared to leave the city also. Vice-President Roosevelt departed on an Adirondack hunting tour. The Exposition city, whose gaiety had been subdued awhile, began to be merry again, and even the little group of watchers in the Milburn house felt that the burden had been lifted.

Hopes Suddenly Crushed

In the afternoon of Thursday the unexpected happened. President McKinley began to suffer from restlessness, and complained of fatigue. This unfavorable change took the doctors by surprise. At 5.30 P.M., the patient was resting more easily, but this was the deceptive prelude to the worst night he had experienced since the shooting. The solid food had clogged the system, producing slight fever and restlessness, which gradually increased. Oil and calomel were administered to relieve the torpidity. As the evening advanced the heart's action grew faint and irregular, the pulse was high and fluctuating. The physicians were alarmed, and felt that a critical point in the case had been reached. Those on duty at the Milburn house summoned the others in hot haste, and soon the entire medical staff was in attendance. Toward midnight the President became still weaker. There was no disturbance of the wound, the doctors said: the trouble appearing to be from the heart and the stomach—the effect probably of the powerful medicine given. Dr. Stockton, a specialist in stomach troubles, had been added to the staff and was giving the case his exclusive attention. Drs. Mann and Mynter explained the symptoms as those of intestinal toxæmia (the presence of toxin poison in the intestines caused by undigested food), which, they believed, would quickly yield to treatment. Stimulants were administered, but the heart did not respond satisfactorily. All night long the Milburn house was alive with lights. Swift messengers scurried hither and thither. Those Cabinet officers and the relatives and friends of the President who were still in Buffalo, were summoned in hot haste. For a time it was thought that the end was near, but toward morning the patient rallied. Injections of salt solution, digitalis and strychnine had been used to buoy up the feeble heart.

Friday morning, September 13, found the whole nation torn with anxiety over the relapse. The news flashed across the wires overnight had come as a sudden and painful surprise to every one, completely reversing the cheerful intelligence of the preceding days. There was a distinct rally, however, that gave great encouragement. Dr. Mynter again said the heart was the main trouble. The patient was at that moment highly stimulated with the saline solution and oxygen, but was conscious and free from pain.

At 9.30 A.M., when Dr. Mynter was applying strychnine hypodermically, the President, whom he supposed to be asleep, asked:

"Is my condition serious?"

"Yes, you are a very sick man," was the quiet answer.

"I realize it," said the President, and relapsed into silence.

It was now, as the doctors frankly admitted, a battle against frightful odds—hoping against hope. The bulletins that were issued could give no encouragement. A little after 5 o'clock in the afternoon it became apparent that the end of the long struggle for life was near at hand. There were intermittent spells of weakness, and the President at 5.20 became unconscious. He was again stimulated, but the now greatly enfeebled heart could not long respond to the treatment. About half past seven, during an interval of consciousness, he asked to see Mrs. McKinley, and when she came, according to the statements of those who witnessed the meeting, he still had sufficient strength to greet her very kindly. She knelt beside him, weeping, and he comforted her with loving words. Soon he showed signs of again becoming unconscious, and she was taken away.

Giving Up the Struggle

Now it was evident to the physicians that the resources of science were at an end. They decided to stop administering oxygen. During a lucid interval, the patient had told Abner McKinley that he felt the end was near, and he wanted them to let him die. Fearful lest he should pass away suddenly, the doctors directed that the doors of the sick-room be thrown open, and soon the relatives and friends of the dying President were gathered about it. In a sad group they clustered at the entrance, unwilling to disturb the unconscious man, yet eager to be with him to the last moment. Outside the house there was a great, anxious crowd which watched with feverish eagerness for every Abner McKinley, the President's brother, and Mrs. Abner McKinley; Miss Helen McKinley, the President's sister; Mrs. Sarah Duncan, another sister; Miss Mary Barber, his niece; Miss Sarah Duncan, Lieut. J. F. McKinley, a nephew; William M. Duncan, a nephew; F. M. Osborne, a cousin; John Barber, a nephew; Secretary Cortelyou, Col. W. C. Brown, Controller Davis, and Dr. Rixey.

In the adjoining room were the other doctors, and Secretaries Long, Root, Wilson, Knox and Hitchcock, of the Cabinet, and Senator Hanna. There was a hush over the little gathering, and all waited, in absolute silence, the announcement of the end, which came when Dr. Rixey, after leaning over the bed an instant, stood erect, facing the doorway, and said in hushed tones. "The President is dead!"

President Roosevelt Sworn In

Vice-President Roosevelt, who was in the Adirondacks when the President died, came back to Buffalo with all haste. The messenger bearing the tidings of the death found him on the top of a mountain in the wilds, hunting with his two sons. He took the oath of office before United States District Judge Hazel on Saturday afternoon, September 14. He announced that he would carry out in all respects the wishes of the late President, and asked the Cabinet to remain in office. He said: "In this hour of deep and terrible national bereavement, I wish to state that it shall be my aim to continue absolutely unbroken the policy of President McKinley for the peace and prosperity of our beloved country."

The autopsy disclosed what none of the physicians of President McKinley seem to have suspected: that death was certain from the beginning and that no science on earth could have saved the sufferer. This is the official report signed by all the medical staff:

The Autopsy

"The bullet which struck over the left breast-bone did not pass through the skin and did little harm. The other bullet passed through both walls of the stomach, near its lower border. Both holes were found to be perfectly closed by the stitches, but the tissues around each hole had become gangrenous. After passing through the stomach the bullet passed through the back walls of the abdomen, hitting and tearing the upper end of the kidney. This portion of the bullet track was also gangrenous, the gangrene involving the pancreas. The bullet has not yet been found.

"There was no sign of peritonitis or disease of other organs. The heart walls were very thin. There was no evidence of any attempt at repair on the part of nature and death resulted from the gangrene, which affected the stomach around the bullet wounds, as well as the tissues around the further course of the bullet. Death was unavoidable by any surgical or medical treatment, and was the direct result of the bullet wound."

The Funeral Arrangements

A simple funeral service was held at the Milburn house in Buffalo on Sunday forenoon, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Locke, of the Delaware Avenue Methodist Church. Only the relatives and friends were present—about two hundred in all. In the library, in a coffin of cedar, covered with black broadcloth and lined with satin, lay the body of the murdered President. His face was calm and natural in expression, and he seemed as though asleep. During the service, Mrs. McKinley sat upstairs, sobbing softly. President Roosevelt, Senator Hanna and the members of the Cabinet, with other friends, followed the coffin, when the bearers transferred it to the City Hall under military escort.

It lay in the City Hall rotunda for nine hours, and it is estimated that, notwithstanding a heavy rain-storm, not less than 90,000 persons were in the line that filed past to view the remains. Next morning the body was taken to Washington for the State funeral, Mrs. McKinley, her friends and attendants and the Cabinet members accompanying it. Mrs. McKinley occupied the same car in which she traveled with her husband in the recent journey across the continent.

This was the programme for the funeral in Washington:

September 16. Remains reach Washington 9 P.M.; taken to Executive Mansion under United States Cavalry escort.

September 17. 9 A.M. Remains taken to Capitol, accompanied by military and civil escort, and there to lie in state.

September 17. Remains under a military escort transferred to a funeral car and taken to Canton, O., for final sepulture, arriving Wednesday, September 18th.

September 19. Public funeral in Canton.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

scrap of news from within. Over and above all, like some distant conflagration, gleamed the vari-colored lights of the Exposition, lending a weird and fantastic effect to the scene, and reflecting themselves in the windows of the house wherein the President lay dying.

At 9.20 Secretary Cortelyou came out, and told the assembled reporters that the President was dying. Dr. Mynter, almost the same moment, sent out word that the death-chill had set in. Mr. Cortelyou added that the last conscious words of the President were those spoken to his wife. Dr. Mann said the President, during Mrs. McKinley's last visit, said audibly to those about him and to the sad group standing at the door of the room, "Good-bye all; good-bye." A moment later, and apparently as though speaking in prayer, he was heard to say: "Nearer, my God, to thee; e'en though it be a cross, is my constant prayer."

The Last Scene of All

This was the opportune moment seized by those in the death chamber to take a last farewell. Then came prolonged unconsciousness. Mrs. McKinley had already been escorted from the room, however, before the collapse came. There was no rally after that. About 2 o'clock, Dr. Rixey detected signs of the end, and the immediate family came and surrounded the bed. There were

Our Dead President

THE President is dead! A wave of sorrow rolls over the land. It is to me a personal bereavement. From the time that William McKinley, as President of the Young Men's Christian Association at Canton, O., introduced me to an audience until the present, nothing of importance occurred in his life or mine, but we exchanged telegrams. We have been very good friends. But he is gone. God pity his wife! God pity us!

President McKinley was all his life the enemy of sin, the enemy of sectionalism, the enemy of everything small-hearted, impure and debasing, and he made many a crushing blow against these moral and political Philistines, but in his death he made mightier conquest. His one week of dying has made more illustrious record than the fifty-seven years living. "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life."

Our President's death, more than his life, or any life, eulogizes the Christian religion. We all talk about the hope of the Christian, and the courage of the Christian, and the patience of the Christian. Put all the sermons on these subjects for the last ten years together, and they would not make such an impression as the magnificent demeanor of this dying chief magistrate. Going into unconsciousness under the power of anæsthetics, he is hearing whispers of "Thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory." He utters words pitying his assassin. In his last moments he chanted "Nearer, my God, to thee, nearer to thee." He was no more afraid to die than you are to go home this morning. Without one word of complaint he endures the physical anguish. All he ever did in confirmation of religion in days of health was nothing compared to what he did for it in this last crisis.

Many years ago he rose in a religious meeting and asked for prayers. Soon after he knelt at the church altar. William McKinley had no new religion to experiment with in his last hours. It was the same Gospel into the faith of which he was baptized in early manhood. That religion has stood the test through all the buffetings and persecutions, through the hard work of life, and did not forsake him in the tremendous close.

There have been thousands of death-beds as calm and beautiful as this, but they were not so conspicuous. This electrifies Christendom. This encourages all the pain-struck in hospitals and scattered all up and down the world, to suffer patiently. The consumptive, the cancered, the palsied, the fevered, and the dying of all nations lift their heads from their hot pillows, and bless this heroic, this triumphant, this illustrious sufferer. The religion that upheld him under surgeon's knife, and amid the appalling days and nights of suffering, is a good religion to have. Show us in all the ages among the enemies of Christianity a death-bed that will compare with this radiant sunset!

These last scenes must impress the world, as no preaching ever did, that when our time comes to go, the most energetic and skilful physicians cannot hinder the event. Was there ever so much done to save a man's life as the life of President McKinley. But the doctors could not keep him. A loving and brave wife could not keep him. The anxieties of a nation could not keep him. His great spirit pushes them all back from the gates of life, and soars away into the infinities.

This tragedy, as nothing else, demonstrates what a hideous thing is Nihilism or Anarchy. That assassin shouted: "I am an Anarchist." Anarchism owns nothing but a knife for universal cut-throatery, and a nitro-glycerine bomb for universal explosion. He believes in no God, no government, no heaven and no hell except what he can make on earth! He slew the Czar of Russia, keeps the Emperor of Germany a tremble, destroyed the King of Italy, shot at Edward the Prince, now Edward the King, and would put to death every king and president on earth; and if he had the power, would climb up until he could drive the God of Heaven from his throne and take it himself, the universal butcher. In France it is called Communism. In Russia it is called Nihilism. It means complete and eternal smash-up, and it would drive a dagger through your heart, and put a torch to your dwelling, and turn over this whole land to theft, lust, rapine and murder.

Where does this monster live? In all the cities of this land. It proposes to tear to pieces the ballot-box, the legislative hall, the Congressional assembly. It would take this land and divide it up, or rather divide it down. It would give as much to the idler as to the worker, to the bad as to the good.

Anarchism! This panther, having prowled across other lands, has set its paw on our soil. It was Anarchism that burned the railroad property at Pittsburgh during the great riots; it was Anarchism that slew black people in our Northern cities during the Civil War; it is Anarchism that glares out of the windows of the drunkeries upon sober people as they go by. Ah! its power has never yet been tested. I pray God its power may never be fully tested. It would, if it had the power, leave every church, chapel, cathedral, schoolhouse and college in ashes. It is the worst enemy of the laboring classes in our country. In this land riot and bloodshed never gained any wages for the people, or gathered up any prosperity. In this land the best weapon is not the club, not the shillalah, not firearms, but the ballot.

But Anarchism is doomed. Russia, and Germany, and Italy, and France, and England will join hands with the United States in memory of Abraham Lincoln, and James A. Garfield, and William McKinley to put down this villainy of the centuries. T. D. W. T.

President Roosevelt

AS provided by the Constitution, the Vice-President, Theodore Roosevelt, becomes President for the remainder of the late President's term. As in the case of General Arthur, after the death of President Garfield, the oath of office was administered to Mr. Roosevelt privately, and he begins his administration, as is fitting under the sorrowful circumstances, without any of the imposing ceremonies attending the inauguration of a President elected to the office by the people.

Theodore Roosevelt at forty-three is the youngest of our Presidents. He comes of a family prominent in New York life for eight generations. There are in it strains of French Huguenot, Dutch, Scotch and Irish blood. He was born in New York City. He was a delicate boy, but by judicious training his constitution was so strengthened that when he graduated from Harvard in 1880 he was a vigorous athletic young man. He devoted himself to the law, but in 1881 he was elected to the Legislature, and so well did he acquit himself that he was thrice re-elected. At the conclusion of his fourth term he was nominated for Mayor of New York, but Mr. Hewitt, his chief opponent, was elected by a plurality of over twenty thousand votes.

President Cleveland appointed Mr. Roosevelt a member of the Civil Service Commission, and he held that office until 1895, when he resigned it to accept a Police Commissionership under Mayor Strong. Two years later, President McKinley made him Assistant Secretary of the Navy. When war broke out with Spain Mr. Roosevelt organized a regiment of cavalry, which became famous as the Rough Riders, in which he served as second in command under Colonel Wood. The regiment rendered conspicuous service during the war, especially at Guasimas, where it stormed the hill with great gallantry. On his return he received the Republican nomination for Governor of New York. He was elected, and held the office until elected to the Vice-Presidency last year.

The President's Wound

The Famous Operation Described by the "New York Medical Journal"

AT Dr. Mann's request, Dr. Wasdin assumed charge of the anæsthetic, and began the administration of ether at 5.20—one hour and fifteen minutes after the wound was inflicted. The President took the ether kindly, and was well under its influence within the next ten minutes. The abdomen having been aseptically prepared, an incision three inches long was made lengthwise in the body, and including the opening made by the ball—a 32-calibre—that was located four inches below the left nipple and an inch and a half to the left of the median line. The incision went through a deep layer of fat before the peritonæum was reached, hence the incision was enlarged another inch. A piece of cloth—probably a bit of undershirt—was found in track of the missile, which looked as if it had "punched out" by the bullet. Upon opening the tonæum, a bullet hole was discovered in the anterior central portion of the stomach. This viscus was drawn up into the operation wound and the perforation, after examination, was closed with a double row of silk sutures (Czerny-Lembert). A little oozing of the stomach contents had occurred through the opening—of which was wiped away. A further enlargement of the incision now became necessary in order to examine the dorsum of the stomach, upon which another opening was found. This was sutured in manner like unto the first, and the sluggish hands on the clock marked 12. The intestines were examined for possible wound, but, happily, none were found, and these were wrapped in moist, hot towels.

A previous hypodermic injection had been made and now twenty-five minims of brandy were simply administered. A further search for the missile failed to discover it, but it became apparent that it had done no other vital damage, with the strong probability that it had lost itself in the thick lumbar muscles.

Dr. Roswell Park arrived about this time—6.25—and joined the staff as consultant. The abdominal cavity was flushed with normal salt solution and the clare began. Seven deep silkworm-gut sutures were employed and catgut was placed superficially between them. At about 6.50 the anæsthetic was discontinued and the abdominal bandage was applied. Thus the operation on which so much of moment depended was finished. The President's pulse was now 122, respiration 32.

The following summary of the surgery done is interesting and succinct:

One bullet struck the President on the upper portion of the breast-bone, glancing and not penetrating.

The second bullet penetrated the abdominal five inches below the left nipple and an inch and a half to the left of the median line.

The abdomen was opened through the line of the bullet wound. It was found that the bullet had penetrated the stomach. The opening in the front wall of the stomach was carefully closed with silk sutures, after which a search was made for a hole in the back wall of the stomach. This was found and also closed in the same way.

The further course of the bullet could not be discovered, although careful search was made. The abdominal wound was closed without drainage. No injury to the intestines or other organ was discovered.

The patient stood the operation well. After the pulse was good; rate of 130.

Tiberias and its People

(See colored illustration on first page.)

DURING our Saviour's sojourn on earth, a considerable portion of his ministry was devoted to the people of Galilee. Tiberias, the capital of the province, that period, does not seem to have been visited by him, his ministry having been largely confined to the towns at the head of the lake, where the population was dense and thoroughly Jewish. Though now little else than a succession of dirt ruins, the entire district was then a scene of life and business activity. Lake Galilee's shores, on either side, were studded with villages, and trading and fishing fleets covered its waters. Capernaum, Chorazin, the two Bethsaldas, Tiberias, Gamala, and Taricheæ, Tiberias and Magdala, were populous and populous towns. Except the two last named, all have passed away, and in some instances their very site is doubtful. Tiberias, built by Herod Antipas on the site of the ancient Rabbath, was named in honor of the Emperor Tiberius. It was a place of great architectural beauty as well as considerable political importance.

Herod had built there a stadium, a costly palace, and a series of baths after the Roman pattern, and there were many other buildings of almost princely pretension. Its population at different times was a mixture of Romans, Greeks, Arabs, Persians and Jews, while the dwellers in the other towns and villages along the lake were, for the most part, native Galilean peasant fishermen. Tiberias today retains its Roman name, but little else; its ancient grandeur has disappeared, and its population has dwindled down to small proportions, being Mohammedan, Jews and Christians, was almost totally destroyed by earthquake about seventy years ago. Bedouins often pitch their black tents within its walls and overlooking the Bahr Tobarich (Sea of Tiberias) these wanderers give to the lake. There is a strange tradition concerning the city, which says that when the Messiah comes he will emerge from the waters of the lake at Tiberias and will at once proceed to Safed, where he will establish his throne on the highest hill in Galilee and bring the whole world under his dominion.

President Roosevelt Sworn In

SADLY in contrast with the usual imposing ceremony of administering the oath of office to the new President, in the Capitol at Washington, was the sombre scene in the old mansion at Buffalo, on Saturday, September 14. On his arrival from the Adirondacks, Mr. Roosevelt paid an informal visit of respect and condolence to the Milburn house, in which the remains of the departed chief lay. He then proceeded to the residence of Mr. Ansley Wilcox, at 11 Delaware avenue, where he was a guest during his former visit. The members of the Cabinet, with the exception of Secretaries Hay and Gage, had assembled here, with Justice John R. Hazel, of the United States District Court. They went into the library, and Secretary Root, addressing Mr. Roosevelt in a voice broken with emotion, said that it was the wish of his colleagues that Mr. Roosevelt take the oath of office immediately. Mr. Roosevelt was standing with his back to a window and, at the request of Judge Hazel, he raised his right hand and, repeating the words after the Judge, solemnly swore to "faithfully execute the office of President of the United States and to the best of his ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." He then signed the parchment on which the oath was engrossed, and the simple ceremony of the inauguration was complete. The customary inaugural address was compressed into the brief statement by the new President that it would be his aim to continue absolutely unbroken the policy of President McKinley for the peace and prosperity of our beloved country. It was noted that Mr. Roosevelt appeared to feel deeply a sense of the responsibility so tragically thrust upon him. It may well impress any man who realizes his possibilities; but we are sure that the God who heard the prayer which the ancient ruler uttered on beginning his reign is still ready to hear and answer such a prayer:

Thy servant is in the midst of my people, a great people that cannot be numbered or counted for multitude; give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people that I may discern between good and bad, for who is able to judge this thy so great a people? (I. Kings 3: 8).

WILCOX MANSION, BUFFALO, IN WHICH PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TOOK THE OATH OF OFFICE ON SEPT. 14

Killed in a Falling House

A remarkable fatality occurred in Hoboken, N. J., last week. Among the houses injured by the tornado of the previous Saturday was a three-story brick building on the corner of two streets. The owner was aware that it had been rendered unsafe, but she continued to live in it, believing that it would not fall before some repairs, which she had ordered, were done, when it would be as strong as ever. She and her servant were on the top floor doing their morning work, when the bartender, in the saloon, called up the speaking tube that the walls were cracking. He urged the women to leave at once. They hurried on some street wraps and descended. Just as they reached the outer door the building collapsed and they were caught in the ruin, but were soon extricated. The singular fact was that the bartender who had cautioned the women did not make his own escape. He went back behind the bar and continued his work. He was so engaged when the building fell, and he was killed, while the women whom he had warned, escaped with a few bruises. There are some good people who are in danger of an analogous fate. Without giving their own hearts to Christ, they warn others whose danger is more conspicuous than their own.

Thou, therefore, that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? (Romans 2: 21).

Perpetual Light

Chicago journals report the discovery, by a resident of that city, of a system of lighting, which, the inventor declares, will supersede all others. It has the merit of giving as good a light as the incandescent lamp, while it needs no wires, nor does it need continuous supply like gas. The inventor says that he was led to the secret of the new light by accident. He was experimenting with chemicals used in photography, when he noticed the brilliant light produced by some refuse he had thrown on the top of some other waste material. He made a note of the ingredients of the heap and then experimented with them. He found that by putting certain chemicals into a glass globe and exhausting the air, he had a brilliant light, which would continue as long as the air was excluded from them. It shines all the time, and when the owner wishes to use it he has only to remove the cover. As soon as he has perfected a mechanism by which, on the turning of a tap, a hood covers the globe, or is removed, he will put the light on the market, and those who buy it will have a perpetual light. It would be well if the Christian's life was always a light of this kind, perpetually shining, even when hidden by the obscurity of his lot.

If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light (Luke 11: 36).

A Hermit's Romance

European journals report the death of a man whose solitary home has frequently been pointed out to American voyagers in the Mediterranean. It was erected on a promontory near Cape Malea, in Southern Greece. People heard strange stories of the man who lived in it, who had been spending some time with the explorer in his solitude. They went north on the Windward in August, 1900, and penetrated to Payer Harbor, near Cape Sabine, where they were frozen in. It was not until May of this year that Lieut. Peary, searching for the ship, reached Payer Harbor. For eight long months, his wife had been within 250 miles of him, without his knowing of it. His report of events since April, 1900, when he was last heard from, shows that he has made another record. The farthest North in this hemisphere was that of Lockwood in 1882. In a journey on foot, in May, 1900, Lieut. Peary passed that point, and went about twenty-three miles farther North. There he was stopped by broken ice and open water. He then followed the coast line of Greenland to the East, 160 miles beyond Lockwood's point, along the most northerly known land in the world. In April of this year he made another dash for the pole, but after ten days, finding the strength of the party not adequate to the severe work ahead, he returned to his camp, and will prepare for another effort next spring. Leaving him there, Mrs. Peary has returned, bringing his records and reports. He is still sanguine of reaching the pole, and means to spend the dreary time which must elapse before he can start in getting himself into good physical condition for a supreme effort. He knows now that Nansen and Abruzy are approaching the goal from the other side, and as Abruzy has already been within 241 miles of the pole, while his nearest approach was about 400 miles away, he is aware that it will demand his utmost power to win the prize of being there first. What a pity it is that such effort and self-denial as these men show are not displayed by Christians in their higher course.

Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown but we an incorruptible (I. Cor. 9: 25).

BRIEF NOTES

An earnest plea has been made to Rev. G. Campbell Morgan to conduct evangelistic meetings in Philadelphia during October.

A report is current that Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, the famous traveler, has determined to devote the remainder of her life to missionary work in India.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will hold its ninety-second annual meeting at Hartford, Conn., on Oct. 8, 9, 10 and 11. The sessions in the morning, afternoon and evening, and, except in a few cases specially provided for, will be in Parson's Theatre.

An extensive effort to evangelize the German Army is being made by a wealthy officer named Lieut. Von Viebahn. He has issued a series of sermons by eminent preachers, which he sends for distribution to every camp and barracks in the Empire.

Dr. Carroll D. Wright, one of the ablest statisticians of our time, reports that the conditions of working people have improved all over the civilized world. Since 1840 the wages of laborers have risen eighty per cent, and the cost of living decreased six per cent.

Under the will of the late Mr. John D. Lakanan, of Philadelphia, the sum of a million and half dollars is to be distributed among the charities of that city. The German Hospital and the Mary Drexel Home for the Aged are the largest beneficiaries.

The Girls' School, or Protestant College, which American Methodists have erected in the city of Rome, occupies a fine building on the Via Veneto, facing the present palace of Queen Margherita. Starting five years ago with but ten pupils, it now numbers 165 students under twenty professors and other teachers.

President Roosevelt is reported by the Interior to have preached an excellent sermon in Trinity Reformed Church, during a visit to Chicago. It says: "His text was the exhortation of James, 'Be ye doers of the Word and not hearers only.' With characteristic directness the Vice-President enforced upon his audience the shame that any bearing the name of Christians should ever fail of honest effort to do all that their Bible enjoins upon them."

Rev. E. P. Herrick, writing to the Advance, of religious conditions in Cuba, says: "Seven evangelical denominations have planted the standards of the Cross on Cuba's beautiful hills, and to-day her valleys echo to songs of Christian praise. More than two thousand persons are enrolled in the membership, and over twice this number in the Sunday Schools. The entrance of the old Gospel into new Cuba has removed prejudices, softened asperities, ameliorated suffering, incited to generosity, fostered improved sanitation, and developed intelligence."

We gratefully acknowledge the receipt, from a giver who desires to remain unknown, of $300, to be distributed toward the furtherance of the Lord's work as follows:

Salvation Army in the U. S.	$100 00	Five Points Mission, N. Y.	$15 00
Christian Herald Home	50 00	King's Daughters' Settlement, Henry St., N. Y.	25 00

News from the Arctic

The arrival of the Arctic steamship Erik at North Sydney on September 13, relieved public anxiety about the situation of Lieut. Peary, who went to the Arctic in 1898. On the steamer were Mrs. Peary and her daughter,

HAITI. THE GARDEN OF THE ANTILLES

A PROGRESSIVE LITTLE REPUBLIC

In a former letter, drawing from personal experience and observation—told THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers some interesting facts concerning our near neighbor, Haiti, the picturesque island republic of the Antilles. In the present article, it is my purpose to speak more directly of the social, business and political life of the Haitien people, and to indicate the causes of their prosperity.

Abounding in natural beauties, it is claimed that Haiti surpasses in fertility all other countries. The island is over 400 miles in length, and 160 miles wide—about three times as large as Belgium, or six times the size of Connecticut. It contains over 31,000 square miles. Its mountains reach a height of 8,000 feet. Large and small rivers and lakes abound. From April to October, the mercury marks from 94 to 96 degrees Fahrenheit by day, and during the night from 90 to 92 degrees. In winter, it averages 84 to 86 degrees. At no time does the thermometer fall below 45 degrees. There are no dangerous wild beasts, only a few serpents, and none poisonous; but there are many kinds of insects, such as ants, cockroaches, spiders, centipedes, and scorpions. Mosquitoes are less disagreeable than in many places in the United States. Fish, sweet and salt water turtles, and water-birds abound, and there are many kinds of birds. Millions of brilliant fire-flies lighten up field and forest at night.

When Columbus, in December, 1492, discovered the island, he was so charmed by its beauty that he called it Hispaniola ("little Spain"). It was inhabited by about a million and a half of Indians, who called it Haiti, which means "mountainous country." The discovery of gold in Hispaniola drew a great number of adventurers to the island, who compelled the Indians, despite resistance and revolutions, to work in the mines or the fields. To keep up the labor market, the natives of the surrounding islands were brought to San Domingo and enslaved. In 1502, Africans were sold by the Portuguese to San Domingo. This was the beginning of African slavery, and of the presence of the black race in America. The African could stand the heavy work better than the Indian.

The principal product is coffee; of which Haiti exports yearly about 70,000,000 pounds. Logwood has the next place in importance, with about 85,000 tons. The yearly export of other products is as follows: 4,000,000 pounds of cocoa, 1,500,000 pounds cotton, 40,000 feet of mahogany, 2,500,000 feet yellow wood, 300,000 feet lignum vitae, 14,000 pounds gaidac gum, 25,000 pounds of copper, 300,000 pounds ox hides, 15,000 pounds goat skins, 100,000 pounds bees-wax, 30,000 gallons of honey, 300,000 pounds orange peels, 1,000 pounds turtle shells, and some other articles in unimportant quantities.

Duties on these products, payable in American gold, and duties on imported goods, form the principal income of the state. Import duties are payable in Haitien money. In consequence of increased importation, low coffee prices, and misappropriation of the public money by a recent administration, principally between 1890 and 1894, Haiti had to go through a long and heavy commercial crisis, which was felt by all classes. The government took up one loan after the other at enormous interest, and under conditions which carried the country deeper and deeper into debt, and which mortgaged all the state revenues for long periods. These revenues became smaller and smaller, until they had fallen from 5,560,700 gourdes (the Haitien dollar) in 1890-91 to 2,618,809 gourdes in 1898-99. The income in American gold in the latter year also compares unfavorably with that in 1890-91, viz.: $2,815,900 in 1890, to $3,560,700 in 1891. Despite the depreciation, Haiti has always strictly kept its obligations regarding the loans. Those who had to suffer from the smaller revenues, were principally employees of the government, who did not receive any salary for months.

Haiti's debts are divided into two classes, the "Exterior" and the "Interior" debts. The "Exterior" is composed of the following loans: No. 1: loan 1875 called Domingue, due in 1922. No. 2: loan 1895 of frs. 50,000,000, due in 1932. The whole indebtedness amounted in 1900 to $19,076,732 and gourdes (the Haitien dollar) 9,372,183. In 1890, the indebtedness amounted to $15,900,000. It was not a small task for the present government to get the country out of the financial morass. After various trials with finance ministers, President Tiresias Augustin Simon Sam, called to his Cabinet a man of great faculties and common sense, Mr. P. Faine. After a year's work, the new Finance Minister succeeded, not alone in consolidating all the "Interior" debts of the state and thereby freeing a great part of the income for the government, but he order as those at the universities in Europe. The faculties are located in Port au Prince. There are five national colleges called "Lycee," located in the principal cities of the republic. Besides, the government sends every year a number of students to the colleges in Europe. In all the higher institutions a great number of instructors are foreigners, specially chosen for their ability. The proper education of the children seems to occupy a controlling place in the minds of the Haitien people, and no other subject receives greater care and solicitude from the government except the maintenance of peace and order.

ARTHUR SCHUER.

Praises in a Leafy Temple

BY REV. S. T. WILLIS

THERE is no more beautiful natural temple, where the saints worship in summer, than the old grove of oaks at the Sing Sing Camp grounds, where, for more than seventy years, the Methodists of the Hudson Valley district have met every August for special services. Perhaps there is no other stated religious assembly in the country that preserves completely the characteristics of the old style Methodist revival in the same degree. In the old days, when whole families would journey many miles in the canvas covered wagon to the camp-meeting, with provisions and supplies for camping out, they formed in the aggregate a literal camp-meeting. The family lived in the camp wagon. Their equipment consisted of a few cooking utensils, provisions for ten days or two weeks, and a quantity of straw for bedding, and underneath the wagon was customary to take a portion of the fresh, bright straw from the wagons and strew it all about the "preacher's stand" and the "anxious seat," whereon the patient might fall. At the Sing Sing meetings they still use straw for the penitents' seat in the circle—the place of the popular religious meetings—and also in the main Prayer Tent, where most of the after-meetings are conducted. The circle is a great amphitheatre under the grand old trees, with a seating capacity of two thousand. Back of the platform from which the addresses are delivered, is a neat building called the "preacher's rest."

The camp-meeting this year was, to a great extent, union meeting, in that the speakers and others who took prominent part were Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Salvation Army leaders and mission workers. The day were full to overflowing with services, beginning at six in the morning and closing at ten in the evening, consisting of preaching, praise services, prayer-meeting, Bible readings, young people's services, children's meetings and love feasts. The song services, led by the cornet and a strong choir, under the trees, was a never-failing source of delight.

One of the special features of the camp-meeting each year is the observance of "Old Folks Day," when the elderly people pour into the grounds by the hundreds to enjoy the memories and associations of old-time gatherings. "Children's Day" is also a feature of gladness and praise. But the culmination of praise and rejoicing is reached on the evening of the closing of the camp. When the stars appear from the circle with lanterns, torches, banners, signs of praise and shouts to "march around Zion," which is the closing feature and the climax of joy. It is always a exhibition of abounding enthusiasm.

NATIVE COFFEE SORTERS AT WORK

enforced also economies which are an excellent guarantee for the financial future. All told, Haiti now owes $26,813,926, with a yearly average income of $7,000,000. There are not many states in this world which can make such a healthy showing.

Rich in agricultural possibilities, with an inexhaustible supply of valuable woods for export, with great coal, copper and iron mines awaiting development, with numerous industries established and prosperous, though yet in their infancy as far as possibilities of development are concerned, with economy in government affairs, and with the true spirit of republican independence pervading its whole population, Haiti has a most promising future. Some enterprises, involving important concessions to foreign investors, have received government sanction and approval, but there is a wide and inviting field for others, especially railroads and electricity.

From the beginning, the Haitien government has manifested a commendable concern for the education of the people, and has encouraged the establishment

About Little Things

By

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

JEAN and I were talking over some of our experiences one bright autumnal morning lately. Her kitchen was spotless, as usual, and she was doing her Saturday's baking, without any litter on the white table, or the very least disorder. Jean is one of those rare women who never look disturbed nor flurried, who get through a great deal of work without bustle or hurry. It did me good to look at her, she sifted her flour and rolled her dough, and, at last, I said what I thought: "Jean, dear, you do your work so like a lady!"

"And pray why not?" she answered, smiling. "Is not cooking for her family a lady's work, and does not lady mean a giver?"

"Well, you know what I mean. You put your heart into whatever you do, and you give it grace, and are sweet and dignified and never in a fuss. I like the way you keep house, Jean. You look as if you had never had any troubles."

But the moment I said that I was sorry, for Jean has had many trials, and in the background of her life, as I happen to know, there is a very terrible anxiety for one dear to her, who is sorely tempted and sometimes yields to temptation. Jean knows bitterness of soul in this brother's account, and often, when she goes to her room and shuts the door, we who watch her are aware that she is praying for him. Her faith never falters, she tells every thought and carries every care to Jesus; but she is not free from trouble. She put her pies into the oven, and sat down by the window. "Big troubles may be endured with fortitude," she said. "They are patiently endured by many people who do not know the refuge and the rest of faith. It is the series of little provocations, the prickings of the hasty temper, small envies, petty jealousies, and sinful misunderstandings, which, coming into hearts and homes, blot out the sunshine, and wear us to shreds. We are often ashamed of our lack of self-control, of our impatience and irritability, of our morbid low spirits, and our gloomy moods; but those do not come when there is mortal illness in the house, or when our dead are lying there, cold and still. Then we gird ourselves to carry our load. The trifles, light as air, are the occasion of most of our earthly discomfort and our pain."

"Yes; that is true. Jean, by the way, did you hear that Will Jones and Margaret Dale have broken their engagement? We are all so sorry, for they seemed so exactly fitted for each other, but there has been a shadow over them for months, and I have feared 'the little rift within the lute, that by-and-by would make the music mute.' They are both only children; Will's mother has idolized him, and Margaret's father has spoiled her. Each is impatient of contradiction, and attaches an undue importance to matters of no consequence. If Will called on Margaret, and his trousers were not creased properly, she would be miserable and lose all the pleasure of the evening. On the other hand, Will was annoyed because Margaret was so very punctual, because she did not like Shakespeare, and because she spent so much time in waiting on her father. The two gradually drew apart; an atmosphere of discontent enveloped them."

"It is matter for thankfulness," said Jean, "that they have found out their mutual weaknesses before they were irrevocably bound."

"Yet, here are two well-born, well-taught, highly educated and Christian young people, conscientious, single-hearted and refined, who have let their happiness break into pieces on the reef of insignificant foibles."

"The art of living together in harmony is one that we should all study, since God has placed us here in families. Nobody masters it who disdains small daily self-denials, and who is not willing to surrender the personal caprice or whim, that another may be gratified. I have seen whole lives spoiled by the harshness shown to children, who were started wrong through their parents' over-emphasis on matters of superficial moment."

"Think of it in another aspect," said Jean, brightening, "think how little things add to the cheer, the charm of life. The well-set table, the flower at the plate, or pinned in the husband's button-hole; the pleasure granted, instead of thoughtlessly forbidden; the concession graciously made; how much these contribute to the real zest of life. Even in a prayer-meeting there is a chance to bring in the benediction of the little things. If the room is well lighted, and the group of young people who can sing are gathered near the piano; if, beforehand, the pastor has spoken to one and another and provided against those cold and wearisome pauses that so often drop freezingly into the meeting's heart, old and young will go away stronger and better for the hour. Every successful enterprise on earth depends on a great many small things, done by a great many unobtrusive agents, for its perfect carrying on to completeness."

"Then, too, there are the little courtesies, the remembering to be ready and liberal with thanks, the small acts of attention to the aged, and the gentleness which never snubs the bashful and the young. Politeness is composed of innumerable little acts, which, by constant repetition, have grown automatic, but their practice makes the distinction between the gentleman and the boor."

WATCHING FOR JOHN—"IT'S TIME THAT JOHN WAS COMING"

IT'S time that John was coming,
So Rex and I look out,
And list, across the meadows
To hear his ringing shout.
The happy time is ever,
When John comes home to me;
When work is done and rest is won,
How fast the moments flee.

It's time that John was coming;
His sturdy toil all day
For me is freely given,
However hard the way.
And I for him am spending
My strength in dear delight:
All day I sing, for Love is King,
And home, love-lit, is bright.

MOTHER'S VACATION

EVERYBODY in the house, even father, had had a vacation, and now, half-way through September, the circle was again complete around the table, and one after another took up the thread of narrative, and told of pleasant experiences. Hilda had been camping by the shore; she was brown and plump, and the salt water bathing and sea air had made her all right for her work again. Hilda taught school. Bob had gone to the mountains. Louise had visited her Grandmother Jenkins at Riverside. Father had taken a trip to town to sell some meadow land. He hated to part with it, but the price paid was so liberal that he felt rich. Mother had not had a day's change all summer, nor, for that matter, an outing in ten years. Somehow they all expected mother to be always there, in her place, like Gibraltar or the Sphinx.

"It's fine to be at home again, and nobody going away for the next six months," said Bob.

"You are mistaken, Bobby," said a soft, decided voice. "I'm going now; it's my turn."

Hilda gasped in amazement.

Father set down his tea-cup and stared at mother as if she had suddenly gone crazy. There was a dead silence, and the clock struck six in the middle of it.

"Why, Susy?" said father. "Where are you going? You could have gone to town with me. I vow I didn't s'pose you'd go."

"You didn't ask me, Cyrus," said mother. "But I'm going now, home to the old Farwell place, to see Phebe, Ann and Polly and Brother Dave. I shall be away three months. I'm not coming home till I'm rested, till I want to see my own folks again, till I've been round all my kin up home. No, there's nobody going to take me. I'm settin' out this trip alone. If I want you to come after me, husband, I'll send for you. My trunk is packed. Martha Sansom is coming over here to keep house. And my ticket's bought."

A bomb-shell exploding in the sitting-room would not have been more stupefying. Hilda recovered first. "Mother," she said, reprovingly, "you haven't got a thing that's fit to wear."

"What's been good enough for me at home, will do very well when I'm visiting."

"I can't let you wear that old alpaca dress, and that straw bonnet with the faded cornflowers, at Uncle Dave Farwell's," said Hattie, resolutely. "What trunk have you packed?"

"My little old hair trunk, dear."

"Harriet," said father, "you pack your trunk for mother, and put in your black silk and your gray foulard, and a nice bonnet; and I'll give you money for more for yourself. And I'll take her, and she'll go in the parlor car, and when she's good and ready I'll go after her and bring her home. Land's sakes, but we've been dumb and selfish, all thinking of what we wanted and never considering her. I'm sorry, Susy," he said, and the blue eyes under the wrinkled forehead twinkled with a glint of boyish mirth. A pair of steadfast brown ones, under silver hair, responded, and the two old folk clasped hands. The children stole out of the room and left them together.

"To think of it," said Bobby. "Mother starting off on a vacation. Mother!"

"I can't see why not," ejaculated Hilda.

And so mother went, and when she came back, in three months' time, she looked twenty years' younger.

Personal Recollections of PRESIDENT McKINLEY

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

NO know President McKinley was a great privilege. Such privilege was mine almost from the beginning of his public life, for I happened to live in the Ohio Congressional district from which he was first chosen. Is a vivid memory, the impression of town much in association with him, and I loved more than ever to admire his patriotic conception of public duty. Further opportunity for appreciating him was afforded during some of his trips throughout the country, when my profession required me to become his traveling companion.

Yet I never knew the real McKinley until the people of the United States had chosen him to be their President. A brief time was spent with him at Canton, in the summer of 1896, after he had been nominated by his party at the St. Louis convention, but subsequently my duties obliged me to travel with his opponent, and in the campaign of 1896 I passed in the company of Mr. Bryan, traveling eighteen or twenty thousand miles.

After the election, the New York Herald, with which I was at that time connected, sent me to Canton with instructions to remain until Major McKinley left for Washington to be inaugurated. So there was a period of almost four months, during which opportunity was given me to see the President-elect daily, and sometimes two or three times a day. It was during this time that his qualities as a man and as a patriot were shown the longest. Public measures had to be formulated, members of the Cabinet selected, and the whole course of the incoming administration shaped.

Major McKinley had an overwhelming sense of his responsibilities, but it would be true to say that he was oppressed by them. He approached them in the spirit due to their gravity, yet his was a genuine, hopeful temperament, and whatever obstacle had to be surmounted or whatever difficulty had to be met, he took it with the belief that a way would be found for overcoming it. The keynote of his character was faith. It was faith which sustained him after the assassin's bullet struck him down in Buffalo, and his serene faith in the wisdom of Providence was manifest throughout his public career. He had faith in American institutions, faith in the American people, and faith in himself. With such a character, a temperament could not be otherwise sanguine, and all public measures were studied by him in an optimistic mood.

I remember one evening in the library at Canton, when, quite unconsciously and unintentionally, he gave some of us a little lesson on faith. It was at the hour when he was in the habit of seeing those who were privileged to call on him, and in whose judgment he could confide and talk freely. Some of the persons present had intimated their disbelief in the efficacy of faith and trust. Without saying a word on the incident which had caused the discussion, and without giving my opinion, Major McKinley related a number of instances which had come under his personal attention, and which showed the comfort of faith and of prayer. It was all done so gently and without any intention of rebuke, but that little talk made clear his own supreme faith.

The uncertainties of power and position also once formed the text for a little sermon. One evening, in driving around Canton just at dusk, I noticed a funeral taking place at the County Infirmary or poorhouse. The same evening, some chance observation regarding the incident was made in Major McKinley's library, and one of those present began to wonder on the circumstances which had caused the funeral. Major McKinley himself told them. A once wealthy and prominent citizen, through a series of reverses, had become an inmate of the poorhouse. Though Major McKinley did not himself state it, I learned afterward that it was through the kindness of himself and other friends that the last months of this man's life had been made comfortable. But the moral he drew was that worldly prosperity was fleeting, and that it was during the reverses that the true qualities of manhood were shown.

I remember one afternoon in Canton, when his library and parlors were crowded with men of national prominence. There were three or four United States Senators, half a dozen Representatives in Congress, two or three Governors, and several party leaders.

A poor woman, with her daughter, asked an interview. She had with her a number of papers, and she told the secretary that it was a pension case. The President-elect saw her at once. He looked over the papers, explained very patiently how the case would have to be sent to the Pension Office in Washington, and what course it would have to follow there. He also promised her that it should receive prompt attention. Whether it would be allowed or not, of course he could not say, but he called a stenographer and dictated a letter which at least would insure for it an early hearing. All this took ten or fifteen minutes, but Major McKinley manifested no annoyance, and by his own patient forbearance he rebuked the distinguished visitors who showed signs of impatience because their business was not given preference over that of the poor woman with the pension case.

President McKinley's home life is so well known to the American people that it does not need to be re-told, but I think that nothing in all the world could have afforded him such gratification at his first inauguration as the presence of the two persons he most loved of all human beings. These were his wife and his mother. During the period between election and inauguration at times in Canton there would be some uncertainty about the health of one or the other, and those were the only periods when Major McKinley showed depression.

After he became President, I saw him occasionally at the White House, and found him always with the same serene faith and the same world-wide charity. Human suffering anywhere appealed to him. The Cuban reconcentrados, the famine-stricken natives of India, or the starving wretches of China, all enlisted his sympathy, and I pleasantly recall the keen interest he showed in the relief measures of Dr. Klopsch and the aid which he gave to those measures.

I last saw President McKinley a few weeks ago in his home at Canton, spending an hour with him in the library, where, more than four years ago, so many interviews were held with him. He was full of life and vigor and hope. He talked to me chiefly of measures of public policy, but throughout it all was the ringing note of faith which I have before remarked was the keynote of his character. The memory of that last talk will remain with me always.

A GOOD judge must have both experience and learning. A housekeeper should be a good judge for she too must have experience and learning or she may think that the soaps made to look like Ivory Soap are just as good. MRS. WOODBERRY AT THE DRAGON THRONE palaces. One thing attracting everybody's attention was the number and variety of clocks in the young Emperor's apartments, not far from a hundred in one suite. It was pathetic, suggesting how heavily time hung on his hands. He must have often sighed to see the world outside, a small map of which hung in his room, for he was but a bird in gilded cage, at best. A small organ graced the apartment, but no music responded to our touch. Melancholy sadness pervaded the palace. A copy of St. Mark's Gospel and Pilgrim's Progress were found in his room, after the flight to Shensi. The Chinese pillows are small and hard. The Emperor's was no exception. How few crowned heads repose on downy pillows. The palace eunuch gave me a few golden threads from the throne chair, with which I weave an Oriental romance bedewed with tears; none the less sorrowful that they flow from the eyes of Quang Hsu, Emperor of 400,000,000 subjects. I had never seen a throne before. Approaching through regal entrances, a vista of throne-rooms greets the eye. Here lives the "Yellow Dragon"; he is everywhere—writhing his hideous, glittering body around huge gilded pillars, woven in the soft pile of the carpets, portrayed on walls and ceilings, traced on the marble steps and urns, decorating every emblem and device, coiled in massive golden strength about the throne, above all, mirrored in the flashing prisms of golden or crystal chandeliers, and his never sleeping eye searching every nook and corner, from the summit of each sparkling dome.

From the throne of the dragon we went to his temple, buried in the leafy bowers of the imperial gardens. Such an assemblage! As I stood face to face with the idols of the royal family, I was mentally measuring the spiritual darkness that stretched from thence all over this land. They were repulsive idols. The beautiful things scattered about the Empress Dowager's apartments are showing signs of decay. Robed in the garments of exile, on the border of the famine scourged provinces of Shensi and Shansi, with depleted treasury, and name held up to infamy, she is no longer "the daughter of joy." At her lovely Summer Palace, crowning the rocky sides and height of the Hill of Longevity, we spent a day in "Wonderland." Nature and art has combined to make this spot a Paradise, but "the trail of the serpent is over it all." We found a costly idol room at the summit.

Soldiers had been there before us; gilded gods had been roasted alive, and pierced through and through. Like Dagon of the Philistines, they had fallen on their faces, and could not rise again. On an island in the peaceful little lake, the young Emperor was once imprisoned. We exchanged a Gospel for a rose, a velvety crimson one, and wondered if the Book of Life had ever been in the Summer Palace before. At nightfall, we were given some brimming cups of milk by a British marine in the telegraph station, as we left the palace grounds. We sent him a "Covenant," and he wrote his intention of beginning again to serve the King of kings, and sent it home to his mother. All over Peking, the most beautiful of palaces were in the hands of the soldiers, and wrecked and mutilated. Not only the sacred Hanlin Academy, but many costly temples had been left in ruins. Yards of prayer rolls, inscribed in exquisite style, representing no doubt the work of years in Thibetan and Mongolian cloister, were tangled in festoons among the branches of the "forbidden" trees, faded by sun and rain. Names of French soldiers were carved in temple pinnacles. No hand has yet been laid on the Llama Temple, with its huge image of Buddha, encircled with tens of thousands of gods and goddesses.

We found many grand parks and gardens kept away from the toiling, suffering masses as sacred enclosures. If the Allies would only turn the glorious domains of the Temples of Heaven and Agriculture into public gardens, their names would deserve to be canonized! In the latter, we found our United States Infantry and General Chaffee encamped. They were about to leave Peking, to the regret of all, for Manila. The Americans and English are very popular in China. As we were coming away, our friends at the Presbyterian Mission, Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham, and their helpers were opening their weekly meeting at the camp. We do not know who now occupy these spacious grounds, where the young Emperor went each year to pray for abundant harvests. Gaunt famine like a spectre invades the northern provinces; unusual floods threaten the Yangtze Valley with widespread scarcity; the crops are all under water, and the smiling landscape lost to view. The plague is carrying off thousands in the south. Famine, flood and pestilence are treading on the Boxers' heels, and the widely defamed missionaries are again God's "ministering angels" at the front, enabled by the munificent and beneficent CHRISTIAN HERALD to give bread to the starving.

Across the way from the Temple of Agriculture is the Temple of Heaven, and the shrieking whistle of the locomotive resounds between as passengers are set down at their ease in sight of the gates. Inside, the British soldiers have taken possession, and never before were horses and mules fed on such sacred grass. The approach to the white marble altar through avenues of trees, and over a marble bridge, is magnificent with natural beauty. No roof intervenes between the altar and heaven's arched dome of blue. Here it was the custom for the Emperor to offer a bullock as a whole-burnt offering and spend a night in prayer once a year. When returned and re-enthroned may he have become in reality what he is now in name—the Son of Heaven, an heir to a Kingdom that is incorruptible, un-defiled, and that fadeth not away. The good wishes of all are extended to the Boy Emperor of China, whose power was taken from him so soon as he endeavored to throw China open to the light. As the Bible has been in his palace a treasured and studied book, may it be found potent to save himself and his empire from ruin, and place her in the sisterhood of Christian nations.

In a train packed with soldiers, our immediate neighbors being little Japs, loaded down with accoutrements, but laughing and playing like schoolboys—egg shells were first carefully emptied for dinner, then utilized as drinking-cups. At every stopping-place, liquid refreshment was handed up to the windows by the Chinese. Northern China is advancing beyond Europeans at present. She has itinerating saloon-keepers and traveling bars at every station. The saddest part of it was, we saw the Chinese passing bottles and glasses around among themselves—a thing we never saw before. The allied troops have taught the Chinese more than one thing.

When we reached Tientsin we had the pleasure of listening to the Rev. Arthur Smith. Tientsin was the home of Minister Wu. Mrs. Wu was held in great esteem by the missionary ladies here.

A most happy event of our trip was the securing of Mr. S. H. Kung as a missionary to Hunan. Previous to the late troubles, he was the only Christian in the Naval Colleges, Tientsin, where he was destined to become an engineer on one of China's battleships. Mr. Kung is now installed pastor in anti-foreign Hunan.

In Shanghai we found work progressing well in our chapel. One of the happy social events this summer was the wedding reception in our chapel of Mr. and Mrs. Christy, of Thibet, two of our best beloved missionaries. The open-door in China may mean the opening of the "sealed land" of the Llamas.

In my first article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, written from the standpoint of a refugee missionary newly arrived, I omitted mention of the Shanghai Seamen's Mission, an organization of influential Christian business men, who have carried on a work here for the seamen during several years past. Mr. David Cranston, a man universally beloved, is the chairman. And Mr. N. Viloudaki, whose warm sympathy and kindness are proverbial in Shanghai, is in hearty and constant co-operation with him. Mr. Viloudaki is notably "at home" on the ships, in the "meetings afloat," which he has looked after for many years. Mr. Cranston and associate workers may well be congratulated on the ripened harvest of the past winter, after many years of sowing and "first fruits." An annual Christmas gathering for seamen has always been a special feature of the work of the Shanghai Seamen's Mission.

Should the C.E. Accept Them?

A KNOTTY PROBLEM FOR ENDEAVORERS TO SOLVE—MR. BAER'S VIEW

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the following question from an Endeavorer in Wyoming appeared on THE MAIL-BAG page:

There are two wives of saloon-keepers and a young drug-store clerk (who tends a bar in the rear of the drug store) who are being considered as candidates for our C. E. Society. Is it right to accept such people as associate members, and to endeavor to surround them with better influences, or should our Society decline them as liable to give the work a bad name? What are we working for if not to help sinners, and in what better way can we do this than by bringing them in? I am President of our C. E. Society.

A very large number of answers poured in, showing that the subject was one of interest to all religious organizations. Finding much diversity of opinion, we decided to refer the question to Mr. John Willis Baer, General Secretary of the C. E. Some of the answers are given below:

There should be no hesitancy on the part of a Christian Endeavor Society in welcoming the persons mentioned as associate members. When the self-righteous Pharisees rebuked the Master because he mingled freely expects this. Now about the candidates in question: Their names are connected with that which is the greatest curse in civilized lands and the most subtle foe of the Church. The liquor dealers, having received recognition from the nation and states, and aid from many political leaders and newspapers, seek to gain respectability through the Church. The Church cannot afford to have the least semblance of connection with their accursed business.

R. W. THOMPSON.

If the wives are not engaged in this business, and their only offence is being the wives of saloon keepers, receive them by all means. Who knows but what the husbands may be won over by the good works and godly conversation of their wives. As to the drug clerk, ask yourself the question whether the Church would receive him. Let that be the test. Our Church would not. "Ye cannot serve Christ and Belial."
A. B.

By all means accept the two wives of saloon-keepers, if they are not in sympathy with the saloon business. Few people have a heavier cross to carry than saloon-keeper's wives, who are trying to be Christians. Jesus received all who desired "to flee from the wrath to come." As to the young man who tends a bar in the drug store, the case is different. If

MR. BAER'S SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM

IF I was a member of that Society, only knowing what is stated in the question, I should vote to accept the two women as associate members, and then strive with all my heart, and as Christ would give me strength, to lead these two to become active Christians.

With the drug clerk, I am in doubt. For his own good, the young man ought to get out of selling liquor. I should strive to get him to go into some other business. I might vote to accept him as an associate member, but I doubt it.

Let me say, however, that the Society will accept great responsibilities when it takes into its membership any of the three. Each one of them must be won for Christ, and if starting as associate members is one step, remember it is only a step.
JOHN WILLIS BAER.

with sinners, his reply to them was: "They that are whole need not a physician; but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance." What, then, should be our position in the matter, since we are here as Christ's ambassadors, but to warmly welcome all who show a desire to be of his Kingdom, for "He that is not with me is against me," saith the Lord. The very fact that these persons are desirous of becoming united in some way with the work of Christ, and with his people, shows that either the love or character of Jesus has appealed to their lives, and there is a longing to know him better. By personal contact and earnest effort, we can help them to take a bolder stand on the side of Christ.
L. NONES.

I see no objection to the reception of the two wives of saloon keepers as associate members, providing always, that they are persons of good moral character, and have given evidence that they desire association with religious people. There are many men engaged in the saloon business whose wives are bitterly opposed to the traffic, and whose hearts are full of sorrow, and whose lives are more than lonely. Surely, it cannot be wrong to surround all such with the consolation of Christian sympathy and fellowship. As to the young man who tends bar, my judgment would be different. He must be aware that he is a wrong-doer.
A. A. KNIGHT.

If the wives are members of the Church and do not endorse or encourage their husbands in the saloon business, but express their disapproval, I would say take them in. If they are not members of the Church and look with favor upon the business, I would not take them in. If the young man is not a member of the Church, he should not be admitted. The Church and its societies are not for sinners, but are for those who have professed a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and are joined together for mutual help and encouragement in the Christian life.
D. S. HARMON.

In admitting members into the C. E. Society, we should remember that it is an organization of the Church, and that the world does not make the distinction between it and the Church, nor between regular or associate members therein; but that Christians do. Also that the Church's function is not only to teach, but to stand as a witness for Christ; it is the "body of Christ." It is supposed to represent the best on earth; even the world he holds the situation from his own free will. he should not be admitted to the C. E. S., unless he gives up his situation or is ready to do so as soon as the opportunity comes.

WM. J. LUSCOMBE.

It is unwise to admit such persons as associate members of the C. E. Society. The saloon trade is so potent a factor for evil that all engaged in it, directly or indirectly, should be excluded from Christian fellowship, unless they consent to surrender the unhallowed business.
J. M. BROWN.

It would be an act of the grossest injustice to keep the wives of the two saloon keepers out of the C. E. Society because of the occupation of their husbands, and it would be an equally gross inconsistency in allowing the young drug clerk and bartender to become a member while in his present occupation.
WM. W. CASE.

We believe that the Christian Endeavor Society would do well to accept these persons as associate members, and that if the president will state his own reason and those here given for their acceptance before his society, it will allow them to come in as associate members. If these persons are allowed to join said Society as associate members, the two wives may persuade their husbands to quit selling liquor, and the young man soon see the error of his ways, and all may soon become Christians.
G. H. ROGERS.

What is the Society for, if not to help sinners? Anyone who will sign the associate member's pledge is not likely to give the work a bad name. Suppose such a person does turn out bad and the Society be scandalized. What then? Was not Christ defamed for eating with sinners.
ROBERT ADAMS.

Try to discover whether they wish to come into the Society from the idea that their own worldly interests may be advanced by their doing so, or whether they wish to be helped toward a better life. If the latter, receive them as associate members, after showing them their duties and obligations, throw around them a positive Christian influence, and, without arousing their suspicions, instil into their minds temperance ideas which shall directly influence their actions. One of the purposes of the C. E. Society is to lead just such ones into better lives, without minding what the world thinks or says.
J. M. HELSLEY.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Hired Girl in the Parlor*

THE "test" that Barbara had proposed to Mrs. Vane was not anything very remarkable either as a test or as an experiment. Mrs. Vane was to invite several people to her house some evening and invite Barbara with the rest, presenting her to her guests and treating her in every way like all the others. The curiosity that Barbara felt was in reality something in the nature of a protest against a remark made by her mother that society would not accept, under any conditions, a servant into its circle, and that not even Mrs. Vane, with all her wealth and eccentricity and social standing, could really do anything to remove the barrier that other people would at once throw up against her.

It was to be rather a large gathering; and, when Barbara arrived, the front rooms were quite well filled. Mrs. Vane introduced her to three or four ladies standing in the front hall. One of them was a young woman about Barbara's age, elegantly dressed and very distinguished-looking, even to Barbara. Her name was Miss Dillingham.

"My mother was a Dillingham," said Barbara simply, as an opening remark for conversation.

"Indeed! Your name is —"

"Miss Clark," said Barbara.

"O, yes, Miss Clark. What branch of the Dillinghams, may I ask? The Vermont Dillinghams?"

"Yes. Mother's father was from Washington County."

"How interesting!" The young woman smiled in a very interesting manner at Barbara. "Then we must be related somewhere. Our family is from the same county. Is your father living here in Crawford?"

"Father died last year," said Barbara, returning the young woman's look of interest.

"It's a little strange I have not met you before," said Miss Dillingham. "You have been shut in on account of your father's death." She looked at Barbara's simple black silk dress, which was Barbara's one party dress, very plain, but in perfect taste in every way.

Rev. Mr. Morton's characteristic gravity was not at all gloomy or morose. Young women like Miss Dillingham liked it, and spoke of it as fascinating. The reason it was fascinating was that it revealed a genuine seriousness in life. Not morbid, but interesting.

"What would you have us do, then? What can society girls like Miss Clark and myself do?" Miss Dillingham asked the question seriously, or thought she did.

"Really, I am not competent to determine your duty in the matter," the young man answered, looking earnestly at Barbara, although Miss Dillingham had asked the question. "Perhaps Miss Clark can answer better than I can."

"I don't call myself a society girl at all," said Barbara, looking straight into Miss Dillingham's face. "I have to work for my living."

"No? Do you?" the young woman asked eagerly. "It must be very interesting. Tell me what you do."

There was not a particle of vulgar curiosity in the tone or manner of the speaker, and Barbara did not feel at all embarrassed as she answered quietly: "I am a servant in Mrs. Ward's house. The 'hired girl,' some people call me."

Miss Dillingham had leaned eagerly toward Barbara in anticipation of her reply. When it came, she evidently did not quite understand it.

"The—the 'hired girl'?"

"Yes. I do the housework there. Everything from the marketing to the dish-washing. I assure you I have an occupation all day long."

"Miss Clark is a good cook," Mr. Morton spoke up as Miss Dillingham stared at Barbara. "I can speak from experience, for I have dined at the Wards." He smiled frankly and in perfect ease at Barbara, and she was grateful to him.

"It must be very—very—hard and—disagreeable work," Miss Dillingham stammered, still looking hard at Barbara.

"Some of it is," replied Barbara. "But some parts of housework are very interesting. It's not all drudgery," she added, looking bravely at Mr. Morton, although she was talking to Miss Dillingham.

It had begun to dawn on Barbara, that for reasons not quite clear the daughter (Miss Dillingham) had not told her mother that Barbara was a house servant.

"Why, no. Is there anything more?" Mrs. Dillingham asked in a tone she never used except to persons who were her social equals. "Are you related to royalty?"

"Yes, I don't know but I am," replied Barbara, flushing proudly, a sense of the divinity of service almost overwhelming her even before that gorgeous figure standing so distinctly for the world's fashion and wealth. "I am a servant."

"How? What is that?" Mrs. Dillingham was puzzled. She stared at Barbara.

"You asked if I was related to royalty. The Son of God was a servant. I am one of God's children in the faith. And I told your daughter that I am obliged to work out for a living. I am in Mrs. Ward's house."

"O!" Then Mrs. Dillingham was silent, and there was an embarrassing moment.

"Well —" began the old lady slowly — "I don't see that that fact makes you any less a Dillingham, or a Radcliff."

After they came out of the refreshment-room something separated her from Miss Cambridge, who had not proved as much interested as Barbara had imagined she might be; and again she was left to herself. For the first time during the evening she began to notice that she was attracting considerable attention. Standing in a corner by the door of the conservatory, she could not help hearing some one say: "Mrs. Vane has no right to go such lengths. It is the last time I accept any of her invitations. The idea of inviting hired girls to gatherings like this! It is simply an insult to all the guests."

"But the girl seems well-behaved enough," said a male voice.

"Very pretty, too," said another.

"It may be, but it's no place for her. It's an unheard-of thing for Mrs. Vane to do. She's done some very queer things, but this is the worst."

"I don't know," spoke up a voice that Barbara recognized as belonging to Mr. Somers. "A well-behaved 'hired girl' is less objectionable than a drunken count. That's what we had at Newport last winter at the Lyndhursts." But then, I suppose he 'knew his place' all right."

Barbara found an opening, and moved away. The rest of the evening she was conscious of being largely let alone. There was no coarse or vulgar objection to her; but very many of Mrs. Vane's guests showed their feelings in a way, several of them said afterwards, so that Mrs. Vane would know how far she had mistaken her own place in society.

As the guests began to leave, Barbara nervously went to Mrs. Vane to say good-night, and found Mr. Morton with the Dillinghams just saying farewell at the door. Mr. Morton bowed gravely to Barbara as he said good-night to Mrs. Vane and went out, Miss Dillingham taking his arm as they passed down the steps.

"I am going to ride," Mrs. Dillingham said to Mrs. Vane, as she waited in the hall. "The carriage is just coming around. I told the young folks to go on. It is a beautiful evening for a walk."

Barbara walked back into the sitting-room, and sat down by the table of prints and turned them over silently. When the guests were all gone, Mrs. Vane came in.

"What! you here, Barbara? I thought you had gone."

"No, I wanted to talk with you a little while," said Barbara with an effort.

"Why, I do believe you are almost crying," the old lady exclaimed, coming up to her quickly. "Have you had a trying evening? Tell me all about it."

Barbara told her, and added something more that made the sharp eyes soften and the abrupt manner change to one of great gentleness.

"Don't worry, dear. It will all come out right, I know. Just go right on with your work. I understand it all perfectly. I'm old enough to be your grandmother, and I've seen some remarkable things happen. The Lord takes care of more things than we give him credit for. We must trust him when we are in all sorts of trouble. And yours isn't the worst, by any means."

BOOK RECEIVED

The Heart of David, by Augustus George Heaton, has already won many encomiums. Rev. Thos. R. Noble, D.D.: "The admirable manner in which you have handled a confessedly difficult theme, that deft way in which you have interwoven happy and helpful suggestions, the charm of the archaic style, the sweetness of the rhythm." The book conscientiously follows the spirit of the Bible narrative in development of detail and sentiment.

BY MR. W. B. HILL.

ABRAHAM had two quite different personalities: one in virtue of his being the father of all them that believe (Gen. 12), he looked to the state of heaven (Gen. 2) and the other, his earthly seed, the dust of the earth." Innumerable times, Joseph was the son of Jacob, age when the spiritual genealogy of Abraham was transcribed. He was the star son, chosen out of the midst of Jacob, who recognized his God, "Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age (Gen. 37: 3), and he bore him a coat of many colors." There is probably a better reason for Jacob's love of Joseph, he wishes to have been the only one loved by the parents, who had really bowed to God. Without nothing of direct intercourse with God on the part of any of the sons, but Joseph dreamed a dream, which dreamed an independent dream at all, and for was it his nature to pay it out. It may be he found in Joseph a desire to be a spiritual child, as stated in the members of the family, "Joseph dreamed again, and he told it to his brethren." Their bad behavior are apt to find fault with, going forward their own experience by waiting for God to prepare the way in hearts of their people. His testimony of him because of his father's faithfulness when Joseph told them his dream "may of him get more." So then it seemed that a father had put himself of his power and arranged them, and his dreams comforted them about anything on the part of him. How we were, especially in the stage with areas of that was the other name of our God? Joseph's dream was very thing which was excluded to others because in the family. Had Joseph left it in heart, or told speak of it to his father, and have been wrong. God had, indeed, said to him, but his brethren were nothing at all common with God to them, very, if, it seemed, like an invariable case of the younger brother and to tell them the one thing to them to come to God and not to Joseph. It is the state of God's love, which tells upon the mind of a family, and spiritual experiences in them and a spiritual history of their attitudes, and so more far from God. But they are still against the power of a life of love and sacrifice. Joseph's second dream, to the son and the dream, and the dream is made obedience to him, brought forth again, and from his brothers only, but to his father also. And yet his brothers and him also saw in him something which had not and his father who spiritual attitudes with God, (Colossians 3: 12).

at home at any cost, trusting God with the consequence, were the parent and the dreamer.
 And the mother with God, the real Father. That lot of converts in which heaven people are willing to suffer as they were before their conversion is a very small group. It may have been the condition in the first time, but it is to have not gone down into the power of the heart. The citadel of the man's life is still in the possession of the first conversion. Joseph's father to Sam, his brother and his brethren there in vain. A man of him was doing in the country, and did him what he was come there for. "I know my brethren," was the answer. Tell me pray them where they are, leading them to. And when the man told him they were no longer at Sam, but gone to the town, some twenty miles to the north, Joseph did not make him an excuse to return to his old past, to find those who had been to that meeting. He returned his journey, and found them in Sam. But he was in need with no work come. Alone and unprotected, the wicked saw he was in their power. If he could get out of their father's world, and with to face upon them, and they conceived and thought, and spoke it out to each other in the dreamer's mouth. "Come therefore, and let us slay him and cast him, into one of the pits, and we will see if we can't find him. Now, and we shall see what will become of his dreams."

[illegible]

true to him? The test had come: would Joseph pass through it victoriously? Yes; thank God, he was kept true; we are sure that in the pit, as afterwards in Egypt, the Lord was with Joseph. One right step, one victory, prepares for another; and probably Joseph had a better time of it in the pit than his brothers with their uneasy consciences had at their midday meal. It was a new and unexpected experience for Joseph, but God does not forsake his people. Joseph was now learning the lesson he had failed to learn at home—that there is no power in man. Farther than the telling boastfully of experience, he was brought to the knowledge of his own out godliness. How far he knew the languages of his new masters we know not, but this is sure—God made life possible to his young servant.

Aiding a Good Work

The National Florence Crittenton Mission, of which Mr. Charles N. Crittenton of New York, is the founder, and which has sent out America more than fifty thousand girls for the unfortunate, needy girls of the world, has recently fallen heir to a legacy of $15,000, from the estate of the late Mr. William H. Hays of Appleton, Missouri. Mr. Hays was a close friend of the cause, and for many years, perhaps to his death, contributed liberally to the support of the National Florence Crittenton Mission of his wife. This organization does a work that no other does and deserves the $15,000.

F. W. Merrill, Winnipeg, Man.

One may also ask about Grape-Nuts Food as that it is supposed to be composed of "granular" starches, that is, the starch contained in the wheat and barley is transformed into grape-sugar, and only by this means that it is possible to be carried out in the human body, such is the effect of the starch and being composed of the granular elements, small groups that disintegrate in the stomach and release the sugar, the change from starch to grape-sugar. Therefore, the food is not a cereal, but a fruit. Grape-Nuts Food and the Food is actually composed of whole wheat and barley, without sugar, it is a whole grain food, and is a very good food for the large and small intestine.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The usual five new questions are omitted this week, in order that other letters to "The Mail-Bag," many of them long delayed, may receive attention. Hereafter, once a month, the entire page will be devoted to this class of letters.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

Mrs. A. B., West Chester, Pa. Who is the author of the poem beginning, "O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud," Lincoln's favorite poem?

William Knox, a Scottish poet, born 1789, died 1825.

Reader, Hopedale, O. What authority is there for the assertion that Noah was one hundred years building the ark?

There is no definite or authoritative statement on this point, but if you compare Gen. 5: 32 with Gen. 7: 6, it will appear as a natural conclusion that, as Noah was five hundred years old at a time immediately preceding the delivery of the instructions about building the ark, and six hundred years old when he finished his task, the work could not have taken more than a hundred years. Some commentators hold that Gen. 6: 3 indicates that the Lord gave one hundred and twenty years for the building of the ark, while others believe the particular passage to imply that God had decided to limit the duration of human life to that term, as the antediluvians had devoted their long lives to continued wickedness.

C. J. P., Port Perry, Canada. Please tell me the national flower or plant of England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Germany, Prussia, Spain, Greece, and the United States?

England, rose; Ireland, shamrock; Scotland, thistle; Wales, leek; France, fleur-de-lis or iris; Germany, cornflower; Prussia, linden-leaf; Spain, pomegranate; Greece, the violet. The United States has none; "loving all the flowers so well," some one has said, "we can make choice of none."

K. A. A., Heath, Neb. 1. Would it be right to allow the Chinese to immigrate to this country? 2. Which does the most damage every year, fire or water? 3. Will Christ's second coming be sudden, or will he slowly and by degrees manifest himself as he did at his first coming?

1. Opinions differ as to the wisdom of exclusion; but it should not be forgotten that China has a population of 300,000,000, and could readily spare a few millions of her laboring class. These, if they came here unhindered, would produce an effect difficult to be estimated. This is the economic view of the question only. 2. We do not believe there are any statistics to establish a comparison of losses through storms by land and sea with those that arise through fires. 3. See Acts 1: 10.

Mr. Edward B. Lawlor, Columbia, S. C., writes:

The story of the rescued Chinese girl, in your August 28 number, was read last night to the inmates of the Home for Fallen Women here, and was greatly beloved to those who heard. It is likely one or more took a fresh start toward a redeemed life last night.

C. L., Odell, Ill. Do you think it will please God for our farmers' sons to go to the city and work in a milk establishment, working part of Sunday?

There is a divine commandment against Sunday labor and desecration. Only that which is a work of necessity or of mercy can be justified on that day. All other is sin and cannot be pleasing to the heavenly Father.

J. F., Brooklyn. What would be the best method to show the masses their error in drinking acids in fermented drinks, etc.?

Education is the best and probably the only method of impressing these truths on the popular mind. The facts should be taught thoroughly in the public schools, that the children may know all about the evils of liquor drinking.

Reader, Syracuse, N. Y. When a child is born, why is it said that "the stork has visited that home?"

The stork has always been celebrated for domestic virtues, particularly for devotion to its young. It has also wide renown for attention to aged parents; but the accounts given in this respect are more fancy than fact. The stork is, however, a model mate and a model parent; and because, maybe, of its extraordinary care of its own babies, the peasants would tell their children of the arrival of a new brother or sister: "The stork brought the baby." The bird usually builds its nest on houses. It is a cherished guest in Denmark, Holland and Germany; the peasants say good luck attaches to a house where a stork builds its nest. In the Orient, sacred honors were paid to the stork, and folk-lore of all lands where it has been found has concerned itself with this queer, tall, picturesque bird, which loves the homes of men.

P. M. M., Morgana, S. C. If A and B are first cousins, what degree of relationship exists between B's children and A? And between A's children and B's children?

B's children are A's first cousins, once removed. A's children and B's children are second cousins. The rule is that your first cousin's child is your first cousin once removed; your second cousin's child, your second cousin once removed; but people sometimes define such a relationship as that of second cousin.

Wm. B., Germantown, Pa. 1. What is the order of Presidential succession? 2. Who is now Vice-President of the United States?

1. The presidential succession is fixed by chapter 4 of the acts of the XLIX Congress, first session. In case of the removal, death, resignation or inability of both President and Vice-President, then the Secretary of State shall act as President until the disability of the President or Vice-President is removed or masquers parade the streets. The custom is of French, Spanish and Italian, rather than American origin. Out of the simple idea of revelry in the streets, borrowed from cities of the Old World, has developed this elaborate festival, whose pageants, at once stately, instructive, ludicrous and grotesque, attract visitors from all parts of America.

E. C., Amboy, Minn. 1. Does Psalm 15: 5 condemn putting money out to usury? 2. What practice does Paul refer to in 1 Cor. 15: 29 where he speaks of being baptized for the dead? 3. Does Paul condemn divorces procured by a wife for any cause, when he says [1 Cor. 7: 39] that the wife is bound to her husband as long as he lives?

1. Usury has a different meaning from interest. The lender has a right to share in the profit of an enterprise in which his money is used as capital. If a lender receives an application for a loan and he makes the loan at a fair rate, his return is interest and is legitimate; but if he learns that the borrower is in very urgent need of the money and he takes advantage of his need to charge him an exorbitant sum, that is usury, or making profit out of another man's troubles. That is the thing the Psalmist condemns as an unbrother-support of the movement met at Basle, Switzerland, in 1897, many Zionists attending. In the Jewish Colonial Trust was organized in London, with $10,000,000 capital, 2, shares at $5 each. Over $1,000,000 has been subscribed, not in large blocks, but distributed in many countries, and averaged one share to a family. The Trust is designed to furnish transportation to emigrants, factories, railways, telegraphs, and the scheme generally. Another Zionist congress is to be held in London. In the present scope of the Zionist movement, the political features of Dr. plans are much modified, and the chief present of the organization seems to protection, in their legal and industrial of Hebrew colonies already in Palestine those which may hereafter be established there. A number of colonies were in existence before the Zionist movement began.

A. B. H., Lott, Texas. Was a Sunday teacher justified in teaching that Jacob did wrong and the Bible in justifies his act. He ought to have been patient and trusted that God in his own time would fulfill his promise. Incidental story condemns his act, by showing that he suffered afterwards, in being an exile and being himself the victim of tion, first by Laban, who tricked him the wife, for whom he had served seven years, and afterwards by his sons, who did him about the fate of Joseph.

Friend, McKeesport, Pa. Are there any Indian orphans to be provided for?

Yes. One of our missionaries writes us that he has still 183 children unprovided for, and others are similar. Address our Indian Orphan Department for full information.

C. D. L., Wilkesbarre, Pa. What is the meaning of Psalm 51: 4, "Against thee, thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight, thou mightest be justified when thou art angry, and be clear when thou judgest." Sure did not sin for such a purpose.

No; his meaning appears to be that confession was the justification of sentence, whatsoever it might be. Some man was on trial for some heinous crime, and the judge pronounced a severe sentence. Some one might say: "That was too severe," or, "I do not believe that man is guilty; the judge should have been merciful in view of doubt of his guilt." The verdict of the jury might not satisfy the judge; but if the man had made a full confession of his guilt, the judge would be satisfied. Doubt would be removed, and the man would be released. Punishing the self-confessed criminal, know that some commentators hold that David was permitted to sin in order that God's mercy might be exhibited to the world, but we do not believe that David meant such thing.

Old Subscriber, Galena, Ill., and others. an error to attribute the hymn, "Come, traveler unknown," to Dean Stanley. Crafts does in your issue of Sept. 4?

Yes, it was an error, as Dr. Crafts admits. The author was Charles Wesley. Unfortunately, the mistake was not discovered until the whole edition had been printed. It was too late to make the correction.

G. A. S., Macon, Ga. Would a wife and a justifiable and right in accepting money left by a father who signed a will and paid in the money after he was dead? The policy had been to some weeks before, but he neglected to pay the money, on account of some misunderstanding.

On its face, such a case would seem palpable fraud. There may, however, be circumstances connected with it which explain matters. If the agent had advanced the money at the proper time, awaiting convenience for repayment, might be different. In any event, it is better for careful and conscientious inquiry.

J. R. S., Folsom, O. No, but in some cases, generous provision is made for the poor once a year, through individual bequests.

William J., Amboy, Ind. It is a question of individual conscience. If you feel in your heart it is right and necessary, we see nothing to object to, as you state the case.

A. E. R., North Manlius, N. S. There is a planation; the two statements are incorrect. One view is that of a consecrated Christian, other, that of men of the world, with no pretensions to spiritual motives.

H. E. Probert, College Hill, Kingfisher, Okla., a missionary working in the new territory, will be glad to hear from any reader this journal who desire to help his work. answer any letters.

TWENTY VOLUMES OF SELECTED SERMONS

BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

WE are pleased to announce that, after nearly three years of infinite labor by Dr. Talmage and a large number of assistants, and at an enormous outlay of money, the entire set of Twenty Volumes, comprising over Five Hundred of Dr. Talmage's choicest discourses, was recently completed, and have since taken an honored and well-deserved place in many a clerical library. The publication of twenty volumes of sermons is a truly a literary event extraordinary, unique and unprecedented. In this remarkable work every volume contains more than 400, and the complete set, 8,571 pages. Each volume has an illuminated title page, is handsomely bound in maroon silk-finished cloth, with gold stamping and gilt top. Volume I contains a fine full page portrait of Dr. Talmage. We feel confident that the host of readers of his sermons will hail with enthusiasm this opportunity to secure for themselves a set of these priceless volumes, containing over 500 sermons, sermons abounding in spiritual helpfulness, matchless eloquence, valuable anecdote and sublime pathos.

Indexed and Cross-Indexed. Over 25,000 Separate References

Every volume of this great Sermon Library is separately indexed and cross-indexed as to texts, titles, anecdotal and historical illustrations and topics, so thoroughly that the contents are readily available, whether for suggestion, illustration, reinforcement or for special courses of reading.

Then the entire twenty volumes, aggregating over 8,500 pages, are indexed as one work, in the same complete and thoroughgoing manner, so that this general index will aid any one to find with the greatest facility all the utterances of this eloquent pulpit orator on any particular subject.

Eloquent Discourses for Special Occasions

Dr. Talmage's sermons for special occasions, such as Thanksgiving, Christmas Day, New Year's Easter, Decoration Day, included among the sermons published in these twenty volumes, are notable as the most eloquent efforts on the lines indicated that have ever been published.

Each volume measures 5 1/2 x 8 1/4 inches when closed, and the twenty volumes require shelf space 32 inches long. Their combined weight is about thirty-five pounds.

The PRICE of these TWENTY VOLUMES is $20.00

Payable ONE DOLLAR DOWN, and $1 a Month for 19 Months, or 10 per cent. Discount for Cash with Order.

Freight charges are always paid by the purchaser.

a President is elected. If there be no Secretary of State, then the Secretary of the Treasury will act. The remainder of the order of succession is as follows: Secretary of War, Attorney General, Postmaster General, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Interior, and Secretary of Agriculture. The acting President must, upon taking office, convene Congress, if not at the time in session, in extraordinary session, giving twenty days' notice. This act applies only to such Cabinet officers as shall have been appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate, and are eligible under the Constitution to the Presidency. 2. Inquirer, Newark, N. J. Who are the Scotch-Irish, and why are they so named?

They are the descendants of a number of Scottish settlers, mostly Presbyterians, who were sent to the northeast of Ireland in the reign of James I., and who located on lands from which the Irish owners had been evicted. They were called Scotch-Irish to distinguish them from the natives.

A Reader. 1. Why is Tuesday preceding Ash Wednesday called Shrove Tuesday? 2. What is Mardi Gras?

1. Tuesday before Ash Wednesday came to be described by the adjective "shrove" because on that day it was customary in the Catholic Church in ancient times for the people to be "shriven" or "shroved" (that is, to make confession to, and receive absolution from the priest). It was made a day of merriment and feasting. At dawn, bells were set a-ringing and everybody abandoned himself to good humor. All day there was a great frying and eating of pancakes, until the day was sometimes called "Pancake Tuesday." 2. Mardi Gras is the name of the annual carnival at New Orleans, when a company of gay ly act. 2. A practice adopted in the early church, by which a living person was baptized as proxy for a dead friend, or relative, who had not been baptized. Paul does not refer to it with approval, but simply to show that there was a belief among people who did so, that their dead friends were living and would be benefited by their act. 3. No, there were probably some women in the Corinthian Church wanting to leave husbands who were heathen, in order to marry Christians. Paul bids them not to do that. Only when their husbands were dead would they have the right to marry.

P. Knapp, Leonta, N. Y. Were Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, Drummond and other believers in evolution infidels? If not how could they reconcile their belief with the account of the creation of man in Genesis?

Huxley called himself an agnostic, that is, one who does not profess to know matters which cannot be proved scientifically. He repudiated the title of infidel, which, like the title atheist, implies a denial of the existence of God. Drummond was an eminent and very useful Christian. He regarded the account of the creation of man in Genesis as figurative, and as representing the ideas current at the period in which the book was written.

Mrs. A. McD., Trenton, N. J. What are the facts concerning the origin of the Zionist movement, which has been repeatedly mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD?

Dr. Theodore Herzl, a Vienna Editor and a Hebrew, several years ago wrote a pamphlet, entitled: The Jewish State, in which he advocated the purchase of Palestine from Turkey, and the creation of a Semitic national government, to be a dependency of Turkey, and under the protection of the European powers. His plan included a national bank, a military organization and a national flag. The first congress in

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ON THE BIBLE

A Remarkable Discourse Delivered in the Presbyterian Church, Oyster Bay, N. Y., June 11, 1901

HERE are certain truths which are so very true that we call them truisms; and yet I think we often half forget them in practice. Every thinking man when he thinks, realizes what a very large number of people tend to forget, that the teachings of the Bible are so interwoven and entwined with our whole civic life that it would be literally—I do not mean figuratively, I mean literally—impossible for us to to ourselves what that life would be if these things were removed. We would lose almost all the standards by which we now judge both public and morals. All the standards toward which we, more or less resolution, strive to raise ourselves. Every man who has by his life-work added to the human achievement of which the race is proud, each our people are proud, almost every such man, based his life-work largely upon the teachings of the Bible. Sometimes it has been done unconsciously, more consciously, and among the very greatest men a proportionately large number have been diligent and students of the Bible at first hand. John—sad, patient, kindly Lincoln—after bearing upon his weary years for four years a greater burden than borne by any other man in the nineteenth century, laid down for the people whom, living, he served so well—built up his entire life upon his early study of the Bible. He had mastered it absolutely; and it as later he mastered only two other books, so that he became almost “a man of one book,” who that book, and who instructively to practice what he had been therein.

In this country we rightly pride ourself upon our system of widespread education. We most emphatically have the right to pride ourselves upon it is not merely of inestimable value to us; it lies at the root of the power of self-government. But it is sufficient in itself. We must cultivate the mind; but it is not enough, to cultivate the mind. With education of the mind must go the spiritual training, which will make us turn our trained intellect to good account. whose intellect has been educated while, at the same time, his education has been neglected, the more dangerous to the community, because of the exceptional ability which he has acquired. what I am saying needs no that education must be education of the heart and conscience no man of the mind.

an admirable thing, a most necessary thing, to have a sound body. It is even better thing to have a sound mind. But infinitely better than either to have that, for the lack of which a sound mind nor a sound body one—character. Character is in the long run the decisive factor in the lives of individuals and of nations alike. Sometimes, in rightly putting the emphasis that we do upon intelligence, forget the fact that there is something that counts more. It is a good thing to be clever, to be able and to be strong; but it is a better thing to have qualities that find their expression in the Decalogue and the Golden Rule. It is a good and necessary thing to be intelligent; it is a better thing to be straight and fearless. It was a Yale professor, Mr. Berry, who remarked that his experience in the room had taught him “the infinite capacity of the mind to withstand the introduction of knowledge.” Some of you preachers must often feel the way about the ability of mankind to withstand introduction of elementary decency and morality.

More Honesty Not Enough

man must be honest in the first place; but that by itself is not enough. No matter how good a man is, if he is timid he cannot accomplish much in the world. Besides being honest, a man has got to have courage, too. And these two together are not enough. Matter how brave and honest he is, if he is a natural fool, you can do little with him. Remember the men in which I name them. Honesty first; then courage; then brains. And all are indispensable; we have no room in a healthy community for either the knave, the fool, the weakling, or the coward.

You may look through the Bible from cover to cover, and nowhere will you find a line that can be construed into an apology for the man of brains who sins against the light. On the contrary, in the Bible, taking that as a guide, you will find that because much has been given to you much will be expected from you; and a heavier condemnation is to be visited upon the able man who goes wrong than upon his weaker brother, who cannot do the harm that the other does, because it is not in him to do it.

Home and Church Training

So I plead, not merely for training of the mind, but for the moral and spiritual training of the home and the church; the moral and spiritual training that have always been found in this book, which in almost every civilized tongue can be described as “The Book,” with the certainty of all understanding you when you so describe it.

The teaching of the Bible to children is, of course, a matter of especial interest to those of us who have when it was under the ministry of Dr. Adams, and those of you who remember the Doctor will, I think, agree with me that he was one of those very rare men with whose name one instinctively tends to couple the adjective “saintly.” I attended his church when I was a little boy. The good Doctor had a small grandson, and it was accidentally discovered that the little fellow felt a great terror of entering the church when it was vacant. After vain attempts to find out exactly what his reasons were, it happened, late one afternoon, that the Doctor went to the church with him on some errand. They walked down the aisle together, their steps echoing in the vacant building, the little boy clasping the Doctor's hand and looking anxiously about. When they reached the pulpit he said, “Grandpa, where is the zeal?” “The what?” asked Dr. Adams. “The zeal,” repeated the little boy; “why, don't you know, ‘the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up?’” You can imagine the Doctor's astonishment when he found that this sentence had sunk deep into his little grandson's mind as a description of some terrific monster which haunted the inside of churches.

The immense moral influence of the Bible, though of course infinitely the most important, is not the only power it has for good. In addition there is the unceasing influence it exerts on the side of good taste, of good literature, of proper sense of proportion, of simple and straightforward writing and thinking.

This is not a small matter in an age when there is a tendency to read much that, even if not actually harmful on moral grounds, is yet injurious, because it represents slipshod, slovenly thought and work; not the kind of serious thought, of serious expression, which we like to see in anything that goes into the fibre of our character.

The Bible does not teach us to shirk difficulties, but to overcome them. That is a lesson that each one of us who has children is bound in honor to teach these children, if he or she expects to see them become fitted to play the part of men and women in our world.

Again, I want you to think of your neighbors, of the people you know. Don't you, each one of you, know some man (I am sorry to say, perhaps more often, some woman), who gives life an unhealthy turn for children by trying to spare them in the present the very things which would train them to do strong work in the future? Such conduct is not kindness. It is shortsightedness and selfishness; it means merely that the man or woman shrinks from the little inconveniences, to himself or herself, of making the child fit itself to be a good and strong man or woman hereafter. There should be the deepest and truest love for their children in the hearts of all fathers and mothers. Without such love there is nothing but black despair for the family; but the love must respect both itself and the one beloved. It is not true love to invite future disaster by weak indulgence for the moment.

What is true affection for a boy? To bring him up so that nothing rough ever touches him, and at twenty-one turn him out into the world with a moral nature that turns black and blue in great bruises at the least shock from any one of the forces of evil with which he is bound to come in contact? Is that kindness? Indeed, it is not. Bring up your boys with both love and wisdom; and turn them out as men, strong-limbed, clear-eyed, stout-hearted, clean-minded, able to hold their own in this great world of work and strife and ceaseless effort.

What the Bible Teaches

If we read the Bible aright, we read a book which teaches us to go forth and do the work of the Lord; to do the work of the Lord in the world as we find it; to try to make things better in this world, even if only a little better, because we have lived in it. That kind of work can be done only by the man who is neither a weakling nor a coward; by the man who in the fullest sense of the word is a true Christian, like Great Heart, Bunyan's hero. We plead for a closer and wider and deeper study of the Bible, so that our people may be in fact as well as in theory, “doers of the Word and not hearers only.”

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT IN HIS STUDY

families—and, incidentally, I wish to express my profound belief in large families. Older folks often fail to realize how readily a child will grasp a little askew something they do not take the trouble to explain. We cannot be too careful in seeing that the biblical learning is not merely an affair of rote, so that the child may understand what it is being taught. And, by the way, I earnestly hope that you will never make your children learn parts of the Bible as punishment. Do you not know families where this is done? For instance: “You have been a bad child—learn a chapter of Isaiah.” And the child learns it as a disagreeable task, and in his mind that splendid and lofty poem and prophecy is forever afterward associated with an uncomfortable feeling of disgrace. I hope you will not make your children learn the Bible in that way, for you can devise no surer method of making a child revolt against all the wonderful beauty and truth of Holy Writ.

Probably some of my hearers remember the old Madison Square Presbyterian Church in New York,

THE SORROWING NATION'S TRIBUTE

SOLDIERS BEARING THE REMAINS TO THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

TAKING THE CASKET UP THE CAPITOL STEPS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE nation has honored its dead President in a manner so impressive that it will live in history as the most remarkable manifestation of universal sorrow our country has ever witnessed. From Buffalo to Washington, and again from the nation's capital to the late President's home at Canton, the funeral train was greeted by day and night, at every city, town, village and hamlet, as it passed, by sad groups of mourners and the solemn tolling of bells. Those sorrowful gatherings in nearly every case waited for hours, through daylight or darkness, in the rain, for the gloomy cortege to pass. It was the never-to-be-forgotten spectacle of a nation, bowed with grief, paying its last tribute to a noble Executive, whose tragic fate has awakened a sorrow and sympathy too deep for words.

After the brief services at the Milburn house in Buffalo, and when the body of the murdered President had been viewed in the City Hall, the journey to Washington began. The capital was reached about 9 P. M., Sept. 16, in a drenching rain. According to arrangement, the remains were taken to the White House and laid in the East room, where they were viewed on Tuesday by a number of prominent people, including ex-President Cleveland, members of Congress and members of the Diplomatic Corps. At 9.15 A. M., on Tuesday, the coffin was borne by a soldier guard to the hearse and taken to the Capitol. The procession was a most imposing one. First came the military and civic escorts, the leading columns of which had reached the Capitol before the coaches had started from the White House. The avenue was lined with a multitude of hushed spectators, who stood patiently in the pouring rain. Six black horses, each led by a black-liveried groom, drew the hearse, which was attended by a guard of honor. Immediately following were the carriages containing the relatives and personal friends of the deceased. President Roosevelt and wife, both in deep mourning, occupied a carriage. Mrs. McKinley was not present, her health being so delicate that the doctors forbade her attendance. Then came the Cabinet in coaches, followed by the Supreme Court Judges, the Diplomatic Corps, the Senators and Representatives, and the officials of the various executive departments in Washington. Many other carriages brought up the rear. As the hearse moved slowly along Pennsylvania avenue, every man among the spectators uncovered, while women wept unrestrainedly.

Meanwhile, a tremendous throng had gathered at the Capitol, and the plaza was black with people, while the roofs of the adjacent buildings, the windows, balconies and steps were densely crowded. All efforts to maintain a line by the aid of military or police were futile; yet the crowd gave way quietly and voluntarily, and made an open passage for the body-bearers and their sad burden, when the hearse arrived and the coffin was borne up the Capitol steps. As it went, hundreds of voices were raised in singing the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," the words of which President McKinley had repeated on his deathbed, during his last conscious moments. This spontaneous tribute brought tears to many eyes.

In the beautiful and spacious rotunda, the casket was laid upon a draped platform, and great masses of floral pieces, in many designs, were heaped up around it. When the services began at 11 o'clock, the rotunda was crowded with an assemblage which included the most distinguished men of the Nation, in all branches of the Government, both Houses of Congress, foreign diplomats, brilliantly uniformed army and naval officers of high rank, Justices, Governors, and as many more as could be admitted. President Roosevelt and Secretary Hay sat together near the bier. After an opening hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," sung by a choir, Rev. Henry Naylor, Presiding Elder of the M. E. Church of Washington District, offered prayer. Bishop Anderson delivered the funeral address. Then, when the choir sang, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," the tune was caught up by the audience, and soon the great rotunda was filled with the volume of sound. Rev. W. H. Chapin, of the Metropolitan M. E. Church, Washington, offered the benediction.

From the conclusion of the services until 6 P. M. the body lay in state in the rotunda, and was viewed by a great multitude of people. At 7.30 o'clock, it was eyed to the railroad depot, and, soon afterward, the funeral train, in three sections, started for Canton.

The second stage of the funeral journey was more remarkable even than the first. At every station, people stood in lines frequently a mile or more in length, waiting for the train. Work seemed to be suspended everywhere. Houses were draped, and many in the assembled crowds were in black. Draped flags were everywhere visible. Flowers, loose, in bunches, and in innumerable designs, were fairly showered upon that section of the train which contained the casket. They were piled upon the car steps, the platforms, and even laid along the track in honor of the dead. At night, as the train sped along in the darkness, the silent crowds standing on either side could distinguish the flower-covered casket, as the funeral car was aglow with lights, while all the other coaches were dark. Canton was reached at 11:56 A. M., September 18. The remains were conveyed to the rotunda of the Court House, where they lay in state, and were viewed by the townspeople until 1 P. M., when the casket was removed to the McKinley home. Mrs. McKinley, who had with difficulty been reserved from complete prostration, had pleaded that her husband's body should rest in the old home on that night before the funeral, and her wish was faithfully respected.

Thursday, the nation's special day of mourning, broke cheerless and gray in Canton. At 1 P. M., the funeral procession set out from the house to the First F. E. Church. It was a sad and tearful congregation which assembled at 1:30 in this edifice, which was President McKinley's home church. Here his children were baptized, and here his old-time neighbors now listened to the touching funeral sermon preached by the Rev. C. E. Manchester over his cofined body. In accordance with the wishes of the late President, the services were simple and brief. After the discourse there was a prayer by the Rev. O. B. Milligan, of the Presbyterian Church, a short Scripture reading, and then, after the choir had sung the President's favorite hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," came the solemn march to Westlawn Cemetery. In the procession were Grand Army veterans, State officials, members of the Cabinet, army and navy officers, members of both Houses of Congress, and local organizations. Mrs. McKinley remained at her desolate home, prostrate and alone with her grief.

All the way to the cemetery—a distance of two miles—the procession passed between lines of spectators, the men with heads uncovered, the women weeping. On reaching the vault, the President and Cabinet formed in two lines, and the flower-covered casket was borne between. Short services were conducted by Bishop Joyce and the Rev. Dr. Manchester. As the solemn words of the Episcopal service for the dead were pronounced, many were in tears. When the coffin was taken into the vault it was buried under a great mound of flowers, many of the floral offerings having come from distant States. President Roosevelt and the Cabinet members, with a few others, entered the vault, and when they came out tears could be seen trickling down the faces of nearly all.

Then from a height above the cemetery, came the crash of artillery, as a battalion of guardsmen fired a salute for the dead—twenty-one guns. When the last report had died away, thirteen buglers formed in semicircle at the door of the vault, and "taps" was sounded, the sad, penetrating notes being heard by the multitude in the cemetery, and even far beyond its gates. The vault doors were shut, the procession reformed and marched back to the city, and all was over.

It is already proposed to erect a national monument to the memory of President McKinley in Westlawn Cemetery. When Congress meets, an appropriation will be asked for this purpose. The school children of Canton have already given their contributions toward a fund to perpetuate his memory in enduring marble.

ALWAYS REMEMBERED

TEXTS:

"HE SHALL BE NO MORE REMEMBERED"

JOB 24: 20.

"THE RIGHTEOUS SHALL BE IN EVERLASTING REMEMBRANCE." PSALM 106: 6.

Of oblivion and its defeats I speak to-day. There is an old monster that swallows down everything. It crunches individuals, families, communities, states, nations, continents, hemispheres, worlds. Its diet is made up of years, of centuries, of ages, of cycles, of millenniums, of æons. That monster is called by Noah Webster, and all the other dictionaries, "Oblivion." It is a steep, down which everything rolls. It is a conflagration in which everything is consumed. It is a dirge which all orchestras play, and a period at which everything stops. It is the cemetery of the human race. It is the domain of forgetfulness. Oblivion? At times it throws a shadow over all of us, and I would not pronounce it to-day if I did not come armed in the strength of the eternal God on your behalf to attack it, to rout it, to demolish it.

Why, just look at the way the families of the earth disappear. For awhile they are together, inseparable, and, to each other indispensable, and then they part. Some by marriage going to establish other homes, and some leave this life, and a century is long enough to plant a family, develop it, prosper it, and obliterate it. So the generations vanish. Walk up Pennsylvania avenue, Washington; Broadway, New York; State street, Boston; Chestnut street, Philadelphia; The Strand, London; Princess street, Edinburgh; Champs Elysees, Paris; Under den Linden, Berlin, and you will meet in this year nineteen hundred and one not one person who walked there in the year eighteen hundred and one. What engulfment! All the ordinary efforts at perpetuation are dead failures. Walter Scott's Old Mortality may go round with his chisel to recut the faded epitaphs on tombstones, but Old Oblivion has a quicker chisel with which he can cut out a thousand epitaphs while Old Mortality is cutting in one epitaph. Whole libraries of biographies devoured of book-worms, or unread of the rising generations. All the signs of the stores and warehouses of great firms have changed, unless the grandsons think that it is an advantage to keep the old sign up, because the name of the ancestor was more commendatory than the name of the descendant.

Forgotten Ancestors

In some old family record a descendant studying up the ancestral line may spell out our name, and from the nearly faded ink, with great effort, find that some person by our name was born somewhere in the nineteenth century, but they will know no more about us than we know about the color of a child's eyes born last night in a village in Patagonia. Tell me something about your great-grandfather. What were his features? What did he do? What year was he born? What year did he die? And your great-grandmother? Will you describe the style of the hat that she wore, and how did she and your great-grandfather get on in each other's companionship? Was it March weather or June? Oblivion! That mountain surge rolls over everything. Even the pyramids are dying. Not a day passes but there is chiseled off a chip of that granite. The sea is triumphing over the land, and what is going on at our Atlantic coast is going on all around the world, and the continents are crumbling into the waves. And while this is transpiring on the outside of the world, the hot chisel of the internal fire is digging under the foundation of the earth and cutting its way out toward the surface. It surprises me to hear people say they do not think the world will finally be burned up, when all scientists will tell you that it has for ages been on fire.

Why, there is only a crust between us and the furnaces inside raging to get out. Oblivion! The world itself will roll into it as easily as a schoolboy's india-rubber ball rolls down a hill, and when our world goes, it is so interlocked by the law of gravitation with other worlds that they will go too, and so far from having our memory perpetuated by a monument of Aberdeen granite in this world, there is no world in sight of our strongest telescope that will be a sure pediment for any slab of commemoration of the fact that we ever lived or died at all. Our earth is struck with death. The axle-tree of the constellations will break and let down the populations of other worlds. Stellar, lunar, solar, mortality. Oblivion! It can swallow, and will swallow whole galaxies of worlds as easily as a crocodile takes down a frog.

Yet oblivion does not remove or swallow anything that had better not be removed or swallowed. The old monster is welcome to his meal. This world would long ago have been overcrowded if not for the merciful removal of nations and generations. What if all the books had lived that were ever written and printed and published. The libraries would by their immensity have obstructed intelligence and made all research impossible. The fatal epidemic of books was a merciful epidemic. Many of the State and National libraries to-day are only morgues, in which dead books are waiting for someone to come and recognize them. So many things have come into the world that were not fit to stay in, we ought to be glad they were put out. The waters of Lethe the fountain of forgetfulness are a healthful draught. The history we have of the world in ages past is always one-sided and cannot be depended on. History is fiction illustrated by a few straggling facts. In all the Pantheon the weakest goddess is Clio, the goddess of History, and instead of being represented by sculptors as holding a scroll, might better be represented as limping on crutches. Faithful history is the saving of a few things out of more things lost. The immortality that comes from pomp of obsequies, or granite shaft, or building named after its founder, or page of recognition in some encyclopædia is an immortality unworthy of one's ambition, for it will cease, and is no immortality at all. Oblivion! A hundred years. But while I recognize this universal submergence of things earthly,

Who Wants to be Forgotten?

Not one of us. Absent for a few months from home, it cheers us to know that we are remembered there. It is a phrase we have all pronounced: "I hope you missed me." Meeting some friends from whom we have been parted many years, we enquire: "Did you ever see me before?" and they say, "Yes," and call us by name, and we feel a delightful sensation thrilling through their hand into our hand, and running up from elbow to shoulder, and then parting, the one current of delight ascending to the brow and the other descending to the foot, moving round and round in concentric circles until every nerve and muscle and capacity of body and mind and soul is permeated with delight. Some time ago, visiting the place of my boyhood, I met one whom I had not seen since we played together at ten years of age, and I had peculiar pleasure in puzzling him a little as to who I was, and I can hardly describe the sensation, as, after awhile, he stumbled out: "Let me see. Yes, you are DeWitt." We all like to be remembered.

Now, I have to tell you that this oblivion of which I have spoken has its defeats, and that there is no more reason why we should not be distinctly and vividly and gloriously remembered five hundred million billion trillion quadrillion quintillion years from now, than that we should be remembered six weeks. I am going to tell you how the thing can be done and will be done.

We may build this "everlasting remembrance," as my text styles it, into the supernal existence of those to whom we do kindnesses in this world. You must remember that this infirm and treacherous faculty which we now call memory is in the future state to be complete and perfect. "Everlasting remembrance!" Nothing will slip the stout grip of that celestial faculty. Did you help a widow pay her rent? Did you find for that man released from prison a place to get honest work? Did you pick up a child, fallen on the curbstone, and, by a stick of candy put in his hand, stop the hurt on his scratched knee? Did you assure a business man, swamped by the stringency of the money market, that times would after awhile be better? Did you lead a Magdalen of the street into a midnight mission, where the Lord said to her: "Neither do I condemn thee. Go, and sin no more?" Did you tell a man, clear discouraged in his waywardness, and hopeless and plotting suicide, that for him was nearby a laver, in which he might wash, and which he might wear? What are epitaphs in graveyards, what are eulogiums in presence of those whose breath is in their nostrils, what are unread biographies in the alcoves of a city library, compared with the imperishable records you have made in the illumined memories of those to whom you did such kindnesses? Forget them? They cannot forget them. Notwithstanding all their might and splendor, there are some things the glorified of heaven cannot do and this is one of them. They cannot forget an earthly kindness done. They have no cutlas to part that cable. They have no strength to hurl into oblivion that benefaction. Has Paul forgotten the inhabitants of Malta, who extended the island hospitality when he and others with him had felt, added to a shipwreck, the drenching rain and the sharp cold? Has the victim of the highwayman on the road to Jericho forgotten the Good Samaritan with a medicament of oil and wine and a free ride to the hostelry? Have the English soldiers who went up to God from the Crimean battlefields forgotten Florence Nightingale? Through all eternity, will the Northern and Southern soldiers forget the Northern and Southern women who administered to the dying boys in blue gray after the awful fights in Tennessee and Pennsylvania and Virginia and Georgia, which turned every house and barn and shed into an hospital and incandescenced the Susquehanna and the James and the Choptank and the Savannah with brave blood? The kindnesses you do to others will stand as long in the appreciation of others as the Gates of Heaven will stand, as the "House of Many Mansions" will stand as long as the Throne of God will stand.

Oblivion Thwarted

Another defeat of Oblivion will be found in the character of those whom we rescue, uplift or save. Character is eternal. Suppose by a right influence we are in transforming a bad man into a good man, a dolous man into a happy man, a disheartened man into a courageous man, every stroke of that work done will be immortalized. There may never be so much as one line in a newspaper regarding it, or no mortal tongue may ever whisper it into human ear, but wherever that man shall go, your work upon it shall go, wherever that man rises, your work on it will rise, and so long as that man will last, your work on it will last. Do you suppose there will ever come such an idiotic lapse in the history of that soul in heaven that it shall forget that you invited him to Christ, that you, by prayer or Gospel work, turned him round from the wrong way to the right way? No such insanity will ever smite a heavenly citizen. It is not half as well on earth known that Christopher Wren planned and built St. Paul's, as it will be known in all heaven that you were the instrumentality of building a temple for the sky. We teach a Sabbath class or put a Christian tract in the hand of a passerby, or testify for Christ in a prayer meeting, or preach a sermon, and go home discouraged, as though nothing had been accomplished, when we had been character-building with a material that no frost or earthquake or roll of the centuries can damage or bring down.

Oh, this character building! You and I are every moment busy in that tremendous occupation. You are making me better or worse, and I am making you better or worse, and we shall, through all eternity, bear the mark of this benediction or blasting. Let others be the thrones of heaven, those who have more might wrought for God and the truth, but it will be heard enough for you and me if ever and anon we meet some radiant soul on the boulevards of the Great City who shall say: "You helped me once. You encouraged me when I was in earthly struggle. I do not know that I would have reached this shining place had it not been for you," and we will laugh with heavenly glee, and say, "Ha, ha! Do you really remember that talk? Do you remember that warning? Do you remember that Christian invitation? What a memory you have! Why, that must have been down there in Washington or New Orleans at least ten thousand million years ago." And the answer will be, "Yes, it was as long as that, but I remember it as well as though it were yesterday." Oh, this

Character Building!

The structure lasting independent of passing centuries, of crumbling mausoleums, independent of the whole planetary system. Aye, if the whole material universe should some day meet with an accident that should send worlds crashing into each other like telescopic railway trains, and all the wheels of constellations and galaxies should stop, and down into one chasm of immensity all the suns and moons and stars should tumble like the midnight express at Ashtabula, it would not touch us, and would not hurt God, for God is a spirit, and character and memory are immortal, and over that grave of a wrecked material universe might truthfully be written: "The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance." Oh, Time, we defy thee! Oh, Death, we stamp thee in the dust of thine sepulchres! Oh, Eternity, roll on till the last star has stopped rotating, and the last moon has illumined the last night, and as many years have passed as all the scribes that ever took pen could describe by as many figures as they could write in all the centuries of time, but thou shalt have no power to efface from my soul in glory the memory of anything we have done or bring it to God and heaven.

There is another, and a more complete defeat of Oblivion, and that is, in the heart of God himself. You have seen a sailor roll up his sleeve and show you his arm tattooed with the figure of a favorite ship, perhaps the first one in which he ever sailed. You have seen a soldier roll up his sleeve and show you his arm tattooed with the figure of a fortress where he was garrisoned, the face of a great general under whom he fought. You have seen many a hand tattooed with the face of

THE HIGH TIDE OF FOREIGN IMMIGRATION

JUDGING from present indications, it is probable that Congress, at its next session, will be called to consider important measures affecting the entire immigration question. Whether the expected legislation will be framed with a view to the general restriction of immigration from the Old World, or for the more specific purpose of keeping out certain classes of immigrants of doubtful desirability, is at present uncertain. That an efficient legislative barrier will be established to shut out avowed Anarchists, and all who hold views that are contrary to the principles of American government, seems to be generally expected.

New York is no longer a distinctively American city, and this characterization applies in a proportionate degree to many other cities, notably Chicago, San Francisco, Cincinnati, Cleveland and St. Louis. For years have poured in, during nearly half a century, in ever increasing volume, and have settled so thickly in the quarters of our American cities, that any one visiting in those sections might easily imagine himself in an old world.

Since the new immigration station on Ellis Island was erected, New York has had facilities ample enough to care for seven thousand immigrant arrivals daily. This is the model station of its kind, and to one who is interested in the immigration question, a visit to the Island will well repay the trouble. Every day of the year, with rare exceptions, a crowd of new arrivals may be found at the station, sufficient in number to populate a good sized village or town. During the year 1900 there were 450,000 arrivals, of whom the greater part hailed from Italy, Russia and Poland, while Ger-year. This year Southern Italy retains the lead among the races represented. Naples alone has poured into the United States a great multitude of people, almost all of the poorer class. Russia and Poland, notwithstanding all edicts and discouragements at home, have sent hither, in a steady stream, their tens of thousands, a very large proportion of them going to swell the dense population of the foreign quarters of our great American cities. Any one visiting these sections might easily imagine himself in a part of some Old World city, where the language, dress, customs and even the diet, have undergone no material change during the passing generations. This is substantially true of certain parts of nearly all our larger cities at the present time. How far these people comprehend American institutions or the principles under which our Republic is governed it is not always easy to ascertain, but it is evident from past experience that a very large percentage of all our immigrant population is ultimately assimilated and Americanized in good earnest. These become good citizens and staunch supporters of the Republic.

Among the great variety of races represented in our immigration of late years, special attention has been directed to a class—fortunately a very small one—which is by no means worthy of being included among growing problem. Several years ago a bill was introduced in Congress with this end in view, but it failed to become a law. It is more than likely, in the present state of public feeling, that the effort will be renewed next winter.

At the present time, the tide of Italian and Russian immigration is at its height. From July 1, 1900, to June 30 of this year, there arrived at the port of New York some 63,000 Russians from Russia proper and Finland. During the same period North Italy sent 20,360 immigrants, and South Italy, 111,298. These figures are phenomenal. They represent a great variety of occupations, including actors, preachers, editors, engravers, lawyers, musicians, doctors, artists, teachers, bakers, tradesmen of various kinds, gardeners, a large number of clerks, professionals and unclassified workers.

Some of the statistics are instructive. Of 5,032 Ruthenians (Russniak) immigrants, 3,673 were male and 1,359 female; 4,623 were between the ages of 14 and 45; 23 were acknowledged paupers; 27 had to be sent to hospital on arrival; 2,509 could neither read nor write, while 45 could read but could not write; 155 brought each $30 or over with them, but 3,960 had less than $30 apiece; 480 of the 5,000 had been in the United States before. A comparatively small number were tradesmen, mechanics or skilled workers in any branch of industry, the majority seeming to be without any specified occupation.

Among the points likely to be discussed, in connection with proposed legislation affecting immigration, are: (1) An adult educational qualification, ability to read and write; (2) freedom from chronic physical ns, Hungarians, Danes, Swedes, English, Irish, ns, Cubans, Spaniards, Armenians, French, Arabs, sians, Hawaiians, Croats, Japanese, and Esquimaux are represented in smaller degree.

n the first quarter of the present year 69,783 immigrants crossed the seas to this land of freedom, and in the second quarter of 1901, just ended, the total was 1,550, or 22,000 more than the second quarter of last the "desirable immigrants." These are the agitators, the idle, pauper, dissolute, lawless, and criminal of other lands, who, having offended against the laws of their own country, here seek a refuge. With the greater freedom to be enjoyed here, they are scarcely likely to change their fixed habits, but are prone to degenerate into license. To shut out, or at least to minimize, this class of immigration, has for some time past been a disease and from insanity; (3) a clear record, showing no conviction for crime; (4) sufficient funds to prevent applicant from becoming a public burden for the first six months; (5) no Anarchist or Nihilist to be admitted. However legislation may ultimately shape itself, it will undoubtedly be in the direction of exercising a just and wise discrimination which cannot fail to be a benefit to the nation.

led one before or after marriage. This custom of tooing is almost as old as the world. It is some cold liquid punctured into the flesh so indelibly that thing can wash it out. It may have been there fifty yrs, but when the man goes into his coffin, that picture will go with him on hand or arm. Now, God says to the has tattooed us upon his hands. There can be no other meaning in the forty-ninth chapter of Isaiah, where God says: "Behold, I have graven thee on the palms of my hands." It was as much as to say, "I cannot open my hand to help, but I think of you. I cannot spread abroad my hands to bless, but I think of you. Wherever I go up and down the heavens I take these two pictures of you with me. They are so ingrained into my being that I cannot lose them. As long as my hands last, the memory of you will last. On the back of my hands, as though to announce to others, but on the palms of my hands for myself to look at and study and love. Though I hold the world in my fist, no cyclone shall uproot the inscription of your name and your face, and though I hold the world in the hollow of my hand, its billowing shall not blot out the record of my remembrance. 'Behold I have graven thee on the palms of my hands.'" What joy, what honor can there be comparable to that of being remembered by the mightiest and most affectionate being in the universe. Think of it, to hold an everlasting place in the heart of God. The heart of God! The most beautiful palace in the universe. Let the archangel build some palace as grand as that if he can. Let him crumble up all the stars of yesternight and tomorrow night, and put them together as mosaics for such a palace floor. Let him take all the sunrises and sunsets of all the days, and the auroras of all the nights, and hang them as upholstery at its windows. Let him take all the rivers, and all the lakes, and all the oceans, and toss them into the fountains of this palace court. Let him take all the gold of all the hills and hang it in its chandeliers, and all the pearls of all the seas, and all the diamonds of all the fields, and with them arch the doorways of that palace; and then invite into all the glories that Esther ever saw at a Persian banquet, or Daniel ever walked amongst in Babylonian castles, or Joseph ever witnessed in Pharaoh's throne-room, and then yourself enter this castle of archangelic construction, and see how poor a palace it is compared with the greater palace that some of you have already found in the heart of a loving and pardoning God, and into which all the music, and all the prayers, and all the sermonic considerations of this day are trying to introduce you through the blood of the slain Lamb.

Oh, where is Oblivion now? From the dark and overshadowing word that it seemed when I began, it has become something which no man or woman or child who loves the Lord need ever fear. Oblivion defeated. Oblivion dead. Oblivion sepulchred. But I must not be so hard on that devouring monster, for into its grave go all our sins when the Lord for Christ's sake has forgiven them. Just blow a resurrection trumpet over them when once Oblivion has snapped them down. Not one of them rises. Blow again. Not a stir amid all the pardoned iniquities of a lifetime. Blow again! Not one of them moves in the deep grave trenches. But to this powerless resurrection trumpet, a voice responds half human, half divine, and it must be part man and part God, saying: "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Thank God for this blessed Oblivion! So you see I did not invite you down into a cellar, but up on a throne, not into the graveyard to which all materialism is destined, but into a garden all a-bloom with everlasting remembrance. The frown of my first text has become the kiss of the second text. Annihilation has become coronation. The wringing hands of a great agony have become the clapping hands of a great joy. The Requiem with which we began has become the Grand March with which we close. The tear of sadness that rolled down our cheek has struck the lip on which sits the laughter of eternal triumph.

FAITHFUL OVER A FEW THINGS

JOSEPH IN PRISON

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCTOBER 13TH.
GENESIS 39: 20 TO 40: 9

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT:--GENESIS 39: 21:
"BUT THE LORD WAS WITH JOSEPH AND SHEWED HIM MERCY"

STEPS UPWARD

Take the guide's strong hand and go
Though his name be Sorrow,
Do not fear to climb with him
For a deeper moon sw.
He can take thee where the night
Passes to divinest light.

Pain holds out a hand to thee,
Take it, never shrinking,
Lift thy feet and rise with him
Higher than thy thinking.
He who follows Pain's behest
Has at length most perfect rest.

God has heard thy prayers. Be glad,
Thou art in his keeping;
Morning songs may sweetest be After nights of weeping.
Sad one, thou shalt sing again
In the sunshine after rain.

—MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

"All things work together for good."
"Keep thyself pure."

Central Thoughts "Thou hast been faithful over a few things." How wonderfully Joseph's story proves there are no "mishaps" or "misfortunes" in our lives, but only providences. There is a tradition that Joseph tried to escape from his masters on the way to Egypt, but was prevented by the barking of a dog. What if that dog had been killed before his alarm aroused the guards? The result is worked out by E. E. Hale in his Christmas in a Palace, in the chapter on "Hands Off." And in an idolatrous country and a corrupt household, what courage it took Joseph to hold fast to his father's God and keep himself pure—let young men and boys away from home consider!

Joseph was brought in before the king, he said: "It is not in me, but God will tell it to you." Then Joseph told Pharaoh the meaning of his dreams, because "God was with him."

Cast upon the Lord in distress; the Lord answered me, and set me in a large place. Psalm 118: 5.

It is better, if the will of God be so, ye suffer for well doing than for evil doing. 1 Peter 3: 17.

Hope thou in God. Psalm 43: 5.

Illustration and Application

In this very land of Egypt, Moses had a double schooling, as did Joseph. Both were prepared for later rulership by the learning of this university of the ancient world, and yet more by the school of adversity. Joseph obeyed God in accepting the crown of Egypt, which Moses, in equal obedience rejected, as one man may obey God by going into politics no less than another by going into the ministry. Both held fast to Jehovah and right and duty at the cost, in Moses' case, of exile; in Joseph's, of imprisonment.

And here again we are reminded of what a noble company are the prisoners of the Lord, of whom Joseph was the first. Into this goodly fellowship of prisoners punished, not for evil doing but for doing good, came, in due time, Jeremiah, Daniel, John the Baptist, Christ, James, John, Peter and Paul, all "blessed," not in heaven only, but also on earth, because "persecuted for righteousness sake." Chains could not frighten them from duty, but how many of us are turned aside even by a sneer! The lion's den to Daniel, like the pit to Joseph, was only a short tunnel in the path to power; but great truth, that under the deserts of affliction and persecution there are wells of blessing for both worlds. We may sure the lot of prisoners was ameliorated when Joseph, prisoner, came to power.

From out the snowy canyons
Clear streams of water flow,
And freshened by their moisture
The fields with verdure glow.
And what upon the mountains
So cold and cheerless seems,
Is changed in sunlit valleys
To life-bestowing streams.

So other hearts are watered
With sympathizing tears;
And other lives made richer
By our cross-laden years.
Through sorrow's gate we enter Into another's pain,
And help them bear the burdens
That on their hearts have lain.

Wherever Joseph was placed he proved himself a ruler, showing, alike in his home and in Potiphar's and prison, the dauntless hope and courage that sure to win at last. True greatness will show itself in little things, as is illustrated by following story of Gustave Dore, the great French artist, who, in a foreign town, lost passport. He explained his loss to the custom-house officer and said, "I am Dore, the artist." "Nonsense," said the officer, "we have such claims every day. Here, take this piece of paper and prove you are Dore." With an amused smile Dore took the coarse fragment of paper and drew a group of emigrants who were standing by. The officer looked on with increasing wonder as the lifelike sketch developed. "You are Dore!" he exclaimed, "for no other could draw like this."

SYMBOLIC STATUE AT ZOAN OF THE HYSKOS KING

Most of all does this part of Joseph's life show how daily faithfulness in lowly places leads to abiding success.

At the close of our last lesson we left Joseph in the caravan of the Midianites, to whom he had been sold as a slave by his own brothers, who "saw the anguish of his soul when he besought them, and they would not hear." "What a luck!" had Joseph, when he reached Egypt, to be bought by so great a man as Potiphar? Call it not "luck" but Providence, for "God was with him." Potiphar was the captain of the king's bodyguard. He was sometimes spoken of as the "Captain of the executioners," because even in the king's presence the sentence of death was carried out by his guard. What possible good could come to Joseph in being the slave of such a man as Potiphar? Because Potiphar's position in the king's court made him a man of affairs, and Joseph quickly arose to some distinction as his most trusted servant. So completely did Potiphar trust Joseph, that he committed all he had to his hand, and he took no account of his possessions. But just as clouds sometimes obscure the sunshine of a bright day for a little while, so dark clouds of suspicion came over Joseph's career. A wicked woman—and that woman was Potiphar's wife—tried to make her husband think ill of Joseph; but she had to tell a lie to do it. Potiphar took the lie for truth, and had Joseph put in prison. Shall we say now, "What a bad luck?" Not so, for "God was with him," and prison life only gave Joseph's good qualities better opportunity to be known. The prison was a larger place even than Potiphar's household. And when Joseph was promoted from being in the stocks himself to being in charge of all the prisoners, so that "the keeper of the prison looked not to anything that was under his hand," Joseph's sphere of usefulness and authority was much increased. God was with him, and he could truly say: "He hath set me in a large place." Prison bars and fetters could not keep in bond such a spirit as Joseph possessed. But even while making the best of circumstances, he thought about a still larger place to be gained through liberty. He tried a key, not such a key as he probably carried about his person, with which the keeper trusted him, but a human key, namely, the butler of the king, who was in prison because he had incurred the king's displeasure. This butler had a dream, whose meaning was revealed to Joseph by the Lord himself. It foretold that this man would soon be released from prison to serve the king again, and Joseph asked him to speak for him to the king. This the butler gladly promised to do. But that butler proved to be a lost key for a time, for we are told that he forgot Joseph. But the key was found, for one day the butler suddenly remembered his promise to Joseph. He was reminded of it by the king having a dream, of which no one could tell him the meaning. The butler told the king about how wise Joseph was in dreams. Then the prison was unlocked, for the king sent for Joseph to tell him the meaning of his dreams. When to James and Paul and Christ, who came from prison to die, it was also in reality the vestibule to a coronation. Afflictions are providential no less in cases like Paul's, whose "crown" was reached through death, than in cases like Joseph's, whose crowning day came in this world.

He fails who climbs to power and place
Up the pathway of disgrace.
He fails not who makes truth his cause,
Nor bends to win the crowd's applause.
He fails not—he who stakes his all
Upon the right, and dares to fall.
What though the living bless or blame,
For him the long success of fame.

—RICHARD WATSON GILDER.

Joseph also illustrates the parable of the talents, where one who had been found "faithful over a few things" was made "ruler over many things." In Joseph's first days of slavery, instead of shirking his tasks and murmuring at his lot, he did his work so faithfully that he was made the chief steward in the house of his master, Potiphar. He lost that place by his very fidelity in refusing to wrong his master and his God as well as himself. Again there was a chance to waste life in repining because his good had been evil spoken of. He might have spent his hours in complaint that God had allowed him to be degraded for heroic virtue. But in prison, too, he was faithful to humble duties, and so became again head servant. He was one of those who get to the head wherever they are placed. He illustrates the saying, "The best way out of a lowly position is to be conspicuously efficient in it."

In the last British expedition into the Soudan, wells were sunk in the heart of the great African desert, where the existence of water had never been suspected before. The camels, the natives, the very soil will be greatly affected by this discovery, which may make large tracts of desert rejoice and blossom as the rose. Joseph's life illustrates the

ANCIENT MOSAIC PICTURE OF JOSEPH'S PRISON

So Joseph showed himself great in every lowly place he was called to fill in the preparatory school of work and pain through which God trained him for the throne.

Many young Christians do not sufficiently realize that religion is to be applied to every household duty, even the humble task in business, such as the one which proved Joseph's faith for years in Potiphar's house and in the prison.

What is it Like in Common Life? A shabbily dressed young man applied to the manager of a big department store for employment. "What can you do?" asked the manager. "Most anything," answered the applicant. "Can you dust?" "Yes, indeed." "Then why don't you begin on your hat?" The fellow hadn't thought of that. "Can you clean leather goods?" "Oh, yes." "Then why don't you clean your shoes?" "The fellow hadn't thought of that, either." "Well, can you scrub?" "Yes, indeed," was the reply. "Then I can give you something to do. Go out and try your strength on the collar you have on. But don't come back."

In contrast, take this story of such a boy as Joseph was. "He'll do," said a gentleman decisively, speaking of an old boy who had been in his employ but a single day.

"What makes you think so?" "Because he gives himself up so entirely to the task at hand. I watched him while he swept the office, and although a procession with three or four brass bands in it went by office while he was at work, he paid no attention to it, swept on, as if the sweeping of that room was the only thing of any consequence on this earth at that time. Then I saw him to addressing some envelopes, and although there were a lot of picture-papers and other papers on the desk at which he sat, he paid no attention to them, but kept right on dressing those envelopes until the last one of them was done. He'll do, because he is thorough and in dead earnest about everything."

Cardinal Newman has said: "To take up the cross. Christ is no great action done once for all: it consists in continual practice of small duties which are distasteful to us."

And this is the task before us,
A task we may never shrink;
In the gay time and the sorrowful time
We must march to do our work;
We must march when the music cheers us,
March when the strains are dumb,
Plucky and valiant, forward, march!
And smile, whatever may come.

For, whether life's hard or easy,
The strong man keeps the pace,
For the desolate march and the silent,
The strong soul finds the grace.

Marconi in China

SUBJECT lessons innumerable have been given to China during the past two years, but none that excites more wonder among its people than the phenomenon they witness in the building occupied by the group, a picture of which appears on this page. We are indebted to Mrs. Woodberry, a missionary in China, for the photograph from which it is taken. The group is composed of officers and men who have charge of the Marconi wireless telegraph station at Taku. The Chinese, it will be remembered, had built forts at that point from which, on June 17, 1900, they opened fire on the combined foreign fleets in the harbor. A heavy bombardment from the ironclads soon reduced the forts, and a detachment of marines took possession of the ruins. A pole fifty feet high has been erected on the highest part of the ramparts and a Marconi apparatus set up, by which the guard on land can maintain communication with the vessels. To the Chinese, it seems nothing short of a miracle that the despised foreigner, without wires or any visible connection, can talk with a ship twenty miles off. It is an impressive spectacle, significant of the whole situation, this little group of men operating the very latest discovery of science while they are surrounded with signs of antiquated, unprogressive barbarism. It would be a lesson for the ancient empire if its rulers learned from the object lesson the advantage of utilizing scientific discoveries. Still better would it be, if the conduct of the representatives of Western civilization was always of character to furnish the Chinese with a spiritual object lesson. The benefit they would derive from learning the secret of wireless telegraphy and the other scientific devices that have made the foreigner powerful, is insignificant when compared with the secret of the Lord which can make him good.

He will worship God and report that God is in you of a truth (I. Cor. 13:5).

Traffic's Solemn Pause

A significant token of sorrowful respect for the late President, was witnessed in New York on Thursday, September 19, the day of the funeral. At the moment when, allowing for the difference between eastern and western time, the body of the deceased statesman was being put in the vault at Canton, there was throughout the city a reverent suspension of traffic for exactly five minutes. Wheels ceased to turn. It was not only the motorman, the engineer who had been ordered to stop his car or his trolley at the time given, and held to do it whether he willed or not. The cartman, the teamster, the truckman, in fact every one who happened to be out on the street with his vehicle stopped. He didn't have to; he had no orders to stop. But he did stop and remain silent, with everything and everybody at a standstill for five minutes. All over Manhattan, and all over Brooklyn and Queens, everything came to a stop the moment the hands of the clock pointed to half-past three. Trolley cars stopped, elevated trains stopped between stations and did not move again until the allotted five minutes had passed. Cabs hauled in their reins and sat still. Ferryboats wherever they happened to be, came to a stop. It was a most impressive tribute to the memory of the dead chief, reminding the Christian of that pause which will carry us in heaven when those who have passed through our earthly sufferings on earth are presented before God.

There was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour (Rev. 8:1).

Banker's Novel Berth

A well-known American banker arrived in New York a few days ago from Europe, after a voyage under novel conditions. He had been in Europe on business connected with his firm, but was unexpectedly summoned here to attend to some domestic affairs. To his astonishment, he found when he applied for passage that every berth on the returning steamer was engaged. He went from one shipping office to another, but was unable to secure accommodation. At the Hamburg American office the clerk happened to remark that there would be no room empty on their steamer unless it was the barber-shop. That suggested an idea to the banker. He asked the company to allow him to sleep in that compartment, offering to pay cabin fare. The company consented, on condition that he should not retire before eleven o'clock at night and should be up and out by half past five in the morning. To this the banker agreed, and he actually slept in the barber-shop of the vessel all the way across. He must have been somewhat uncomfortable in such quarters, but he congratulated himself on getting across anyhow and did not mind the temporary inconvenience, if he could only reach his home in time. So it should be with the Christian in his journey through life. The trials of the way are not to be compared with the joy awaiting him.

I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us (Rom. 8:18).

Administered the Oath

The ceremony of administering the oath to the new President, as described in this journal last week, was conducted by Justice John B. Hazel, of the United States District Court. His portrait appears on this page. It is remembered now that Mr. Hazel's appointment was made by the late President after a severe struggle between the two factions of the Republican party in New York State. Senator Platt had urged his nomination, which was strongly indorsed by influential Republicans. The anti-machine men, however, protested against it, and sent a committee to influence President McKinley. After waiting a short time to give the two factions an opportunity to settle their differences the appointment was made. It any snake-bite in the world. The visitor was astonished to learn what a dangerous burden he had been carrying around with him, and declared he would not touch it again. The Park people were welcome to it. It was removed to a tin-box, on which a label was put characterizing the contents as dangerous. It was well for the man that he took the snake to some one who could tell him how deadly it was, otherwise, admiring its beauty, as he did, he might have been bitten by it. It is sometimes the duty of ministers and Christian workers to give a similar warning to young people who are acquiring ruinous habits. Unhappily, their warnings are not always heeded as promptly as the superintendent's warning was. The victim does not believe the habit dangerous, or trusts in his own power to escape, until it is too late.

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death (Prov. 14:12).

BRIEF NOTES

A Mohammedan merchant in East Africa recently visited the Church Missionary Society's institutions at Namirembe. He was so impressed with the benefits the people were deriving from the work, that he left a gift of 1,000 rupees.

A memorial to the late Dr. Norman Kerr, the well-known specialist in inebriety, has been placed in St. Mark's Church, Hamilton terrace, London. It consists of a mosaic picture of the Parable of the Good Samaritan.

Miss Helen Gladstone, daughter of the late English statesman, has withdrawn from society to become head worker in a settlement house in a poor district in London.

In the course of a recent sermon, Dr. Parker, of London, is reported to have declared his conviction that if the children were converted to total abstinence, all England would be evangelized twenty years hence.

An Abyssinian teacher has recently gone back to his own land after a sojourn in Europe. He takes with him an Ethiopian New Testament, the preparation of which he has revised. King Menelik is reported to have given him a cordial reception.

Arrangements are being made to give the students in the divinity school of Chicago University the advantage of a brief tour in Palestine. Four weeks will be spent in Jerusalem. Two weeks will be devoted to camping trips in Samaria, Galilee and Decapolis. Visits will be made to Damascus, Baalbek, Beyrout, Cairo, Smyrna, Ephesus, Athens, Rome and Naples.

General Booth, of the Salvation Army, expects, after the great Congress in New York, which closes on October 4, to visit Buffalo, Rochester, and other cities of the State. Thence he will go to Boston, and other New England cities. On October 21 he has promised to be in Philadelphia, whence he will go to Toronto for the Canadian Congress. In November he begins his tour in the West, visiting Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Omaha, etc., reaching San Francisco on December 29. Thence he goes to Texas, New Orleans, Washington, and is scheduled to be in New York again February 6.

was a coincidence that when a Federal officer was needed to assist the President to office, Judge Hazel should be the one at hand, and that he had to go to the house of one of his chief opponents for the purpose. The prayers of God's people throughout the land are being offered, that the simple inaugural ceremony which Judge Hazel conducted may be in its results like that ancient inauguration which a consecrated Judge conducted in obedience to the divine command:

The Lord said, Anoint him for this is he, and the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward (I. Samuel 16:12).

Had a Deadly Snake

A visitor to the New York Zoological Gardens had a bad scare a few days ago. He asked to see the superintendent of the snake section, that he might show him a curiosity. He told that officer that a friend, who was a fruit importer, had found a peculiar snake in a bunch of bananas and had given it to him. He had it in a cardboard box, which he opened in a careless way. The superintendent recognized it at once as a Cuban Fer-de-Lance, whose bite is said to be the deadliest of

THE ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE

Meetings in London of Five Hundred Delegates Representing Thirty Million Methodists in Many Lands

PLAIN and almost common in appearance is the old church in London, in which for two weeks daily meetings have been held of representatives of Methodism from many lands. Standing on the site of that church, one hundred and twenty-four years ago, John Wesley, having just laid the foundation stone of the building, preached from the text, Numbers 23: 23, "What hath God wrought?" If looking down from the heavenly mansions he could see the gathering within the walls of that edifice, and know that the men assembled there represented thirty million persons, belonging to the church which he founded, he would have realized how much more reason there was for the exclamation of his text.

The five hundred delegates in attendance were divided in two sections, the Eastern and Western. The Eastern numbered 200, apportioned as follows: Wesleyan Methodism, 86; Primitive Methodists, 34; New Connexion Methodists, 10; Bible Christians, 10; United Methodist Free Churches, 20; Irish Methodists, 10; Wesleyan Reform Union, 3; Independent Methodists, 3; French Methodists, 2; West Indian Methodists, 6; Australian Methodist Church, 12; South African Methodist Church, 10. The Western section numbered 300, apportioned as follows: The Methodist Episcopal Church, 129; the Methodist Episcopal Church South, 70; the African Methodist Episcopal Church, 18; the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, 15; the Methodist Church of Canada, 20; the remainder being divided among various minor bodies. The difference between these branches of the Methodist communion is wholly superficial. They are one in spirit, and their delegates assemble harmoniously in conference. The hymn with which John Wesley celebrated the increase of the church near the close of his career is more significant now that the numbers in its fold are counted by millions:

O the fathomless love
That has deigned to approve
And prosper the work of my hands!
With my pastoral crook
I went over the brook,
And, behold, I am spread into bands!

The presiding officer was the President of the Wesleyan Conference, Dr. W. T. Davison. The opening sermon was preached by Bishop Galloway, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In the interval between the opening session and the afternoon session, the delegates paid a visit to the burial ground near the church in which John Bunyan is buried, and the gravestones bear the names of many men honored by all the Methodist bodies.

Cordial addresses of welcome were made from the Eastern section to the Western, by Dr. E. E. Jenkins of the Wesleyan Church; Rev. Joseph Odell of the Primitive Methodist Church; and Sir Charles T. Skelton of the Methodist New Connexion. The responses came from Bishop Hurst of Washington, Dr. John Potts of Canada, and Bishop A. Walters of the Zion Church. A revised programme was prepared which contained the following subjects to be considered: the present position of Methodism; the influence of Methodism in the promotion of international peace; the relation of Methodism to the Evangelical Free Church movement; Biblical criticism and the Christian faith; the principles of Protestantism versus modern sacerdotalism; Methodism and education in the twentieth century; Christianity and modern unbelief; modern indifferentism; Methodist literature; Methodist young people's societies; is Methodism retaining its spiritual vitality? the neglect of family religion and worship; practical methods of dealing with the liquor traffic; gambling; the perils of increasing wealth and luxury; the elements of pulpit effectiveness; how to mobilise the whole Church; and missions. One of the most significant events of the Conference, in view of the attitude of hostility to dissent so long maintained by the Church of England, was the presentation of the following cordial letter from Dr. A. F. Ingram, Bishop of London:

To the President of the Methodist Ecumenical Conference.

DEAR SIR: I am absent from London during the month of September, but I cannot allow a gathering such as the Methodist Ecumenical Conference, representative of so many who love and serve our Lord Jesus Christ in different parts of the world, to assemble in the Metropolis without sending them a line of greeting.

I notice that a prominent member of the Conference, in a published interview last week, said: "There never was a more loyal Churchman than John Wesley until he was forced to organize a separate ecclesiastical body. But Wesley never formally withdrew from the Church of England."

It is that love of your founder for the Church to which he belonged which makes us, in the Church of England, feel a special interest in that body of Christians which your Conference represents, and we deeply regret the causes which led to the formation of Wesleyans into a separate organization.

While we recognize with admiration the zeal and fervent love displayed by your body in good works throughout the world, and the noble generosity which has contributed well-nigh a million pounds to your special Commemoration Fund, it is still our hope and prayer that in the Providence of God it may one day be reunited to the old Church from which you and we equally recognize that it sprang. May God guide your deliberations by His Holy Spirit and make them fruitful for the good of the world and helpful towards the reunion of Christendom! Your fellow servant in Christ Jesus,

A. F. LONDON.

An interesting paper was read by Rev. Edward Boaden on the position of Methodism in the Eastern of Canada, to which the place of honor must be assigned, most of the Methodists in New Zealand united as one church since the Ecumenical Conference of 1891. The new and imposing Commonwealth of Australia is in this direction, as in some others, outpacing brave and democratic New Zealand; for all nations of Methodism there now virtually, and will actually, form one organic whole. In Great Britain, Methodist Churches are coming together, if not one organic union, yet for various practical purposes."

Dr. John F. Goucher, of Baltimore, dealt with the same subject in the Western section, and presented some remarkable statistics of the growth of Methodism in America. He, too, looked forward hopefully to the union of the various bodies in the near future. He said: "Two-thirds of all the Methodists in the world are enrolled in the United States. The Methodist Church of Canada has the largest enrollment of any Protestant Church in the Dominion, numbering 285,000, with church property valued at $16,000,000, and an estimated population of 1,000,000. In the Province of Ontario, the Methodists are at one-third of the total population. In the United States, during the nineteenth century, the population increased from 5,305,921 in 1800, to 76,295,220 in 1900. The Methodist Communicants increased 91.17 times, or one-third times faster than the population. They numbered in 1800, 64,894, and in 1900, 5,916,348 or 610,423 more than the entire population of 1800. They were to the population of 1800 as one to eighty-two, and in 1900 as one to thirteen. Estimating two and one-half adherents for each communicant, the Methodists numbered 20,707,218, or more than one-fourth of the entire population."

"Canadian Methodism has enriched the entire church by its impressive example, illustrating how desirable it is for brethren to live and labor in unity. There is something stirring, would it were a ground swell, of the same spirit in the United States. There is one movement in particular, which many among the wisest and most devoted would hail with unspeakable joy. A federation between the two great branches of Episcopal Methodism, substituting co-operation for competition, would concentrate and economize energy and resource, and increase efficiency."

The sessions throughout the Conference were characterized by enthusiasm and hearty fraternal feeling. Summing up the results, Bishop Galloway said: "The Conference has marked another distinct advance in closer co-operation between the several branches of our great ecclesiastical family. The Conference has given evidence of wide hospitality to progressive Christian scholarship."

"On the great ethical questions of the day the Conference has spoken with characteristic emphasis, without compromise or hesitation. Methodism insists on high ideals in holy living, and on the stewardship of wealth. The Conference uttered a voice that will be heard and heeded throughout the world."

"I believe this great Conference has brought England and the United States nearer together. I am sure these nations never were so united in purpose and spirit as to-day. Every American will return to his home profoundly impressed with the sincere and universal sorrow of England over the tragedy which has so sorely bereaved our beloved country."

Throughout the Conference there was deep interest manifested in the crime which shocked the whole world and the most intense earnestness in the prayers offered by delegates of all nations, so long as President McKinley lived, for his recovery. The closing session was a memorial service for the departed statesman.

The platform was draped in black and white and British and American flags were entwined about the pulpit. The organ played a Dead March, impressive addresses were made and "Nearer, my God, to Thee" was sung. Ambassador Choate was among those present. It was remembered as a sad coincidence that when the Ecumenical Conference was last held in London in 1881, there was a similar service in memory of President Garfield whose death from the assassin's bullet occurred while the Conference was in session.

Section, in the course of which he referred to the tendency of the various bodies of Methodists to unite in making one strong church, a tendency which he attributed in a large measure to the influence of these decennial Ecumenical Conferences. He said: "Methodism in this section presents an aspect of ever-growing unity. At no time in its history has it been so free from strife as now. Denominational divisions have not diminished, it is true; but organic unions between portions of them have happily been accomplished. Following the lead

Legislation Needed

WHATEVER may be its defects, this Government of ours is the best the world has ever known. No country on the globe enjoys so much freedom, and nowhere are the people so happy, prosperous and contented. It is a "sweet land of liberty" in reality, not merely in name, and if those immigrants who come here to escape the evils of monarchies, oppression, and class privilege in the Old World, find that they cannot live under our form of government, then it is certain they could not live anywhere. Such are the disturbers of the world's peace, the chronically discontented, the lazy, worthless, shiftless, vagabond element, which all civilized lands would gladly spew out from their borders. They are not welcome here, and we do not want them. Our gates should be barred securely against such fomenters of treason, such plotters against the public peace. While every good and worthy man or woman from any land under the sun is welcome, we must, in self protection and for the sake of our future peace, shut out, hereafter, those who are the enemies of the Republic, whether they be known as Anarchists, Communists, Nihilists, or what-not. They are utter irreconcilables, foes to all forms of authority, and incapable of comprehending what loyal Americanism means.

This class, fortunately small, is dangerous, and in view of recent events it should be rendered harmless as expeditiously as possible. There is a strong likelihood that Congress, when it assembles, will take drastic measures for its suppression, and that the various States, each in its own right, will also pass such legislative enactments as may be necessary to discourage the traitorous propaganda, especially in the larger cities. In this work of purification, every right-minded citizen will gladly co-operate.

There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie. Rev. 21: 27.

The Libraries

MEN sometimes give their money away because they have to give it up, anyhow. They take it as far along with them as possible, and would take it clean through the eternal gates if they could, and sit down on it in Heaven; but they find no convenience for transportation of bullion across the Styx, and so, in the last moment, they throw it at a Bible Society, or a historical library, saying: "Catch this, and put me down as one of your almoners." But here is a man in health and prosperity, who hands over a magnificent donation, not because he is compelled to leave it, but because he wants to help a grand institution. Post-mortem beneficence is well, but ante-mortem beneficence is better. What a monument a man builds to himself when he builds it in books, builds it in the intellectual and moral improvement of his city, builds it while he lives, so he can read its inscription, not, "Here is entombed a man, born at such a time, and died at another time; peace to his ashes," but, "Here lies a man who loved his city, and loved humankind, and loved his God; and here he will live as long as the world lives; peace to his great, living soul."

A contribution to a public library is especially gracious at this time. Book-reading needs to be fostered. Everything in this day goes to newspapers. There are men who read three or four newspapers a day, who do not read one book in two years. By all means read the daily and weekly newspapers. Without newspaper reading you cannot be intelligent, and you cannot be useful; but you also need consecutive reading of books—books of history, books of science, books of travel, books of art, books of essay, books of poetry. You ought to have one book all the time occupying your spare hours. It ought to be on the stand, or on the counting-desk, or on your dressing-case, and every day you ought to dip into it. You want consecutive knowledge, elaborated information, wide sweeping views, such as you can get only from books.

He who blesses a public library blesses all classes of people, and blesses them for both worlds. The more such institutions you build, the more those already built will be prospered. The more people read, the more they will want to read. Make the appetite of a city voracious for literature, and all the books of your libraries will not be able to satiate it. The inspired sage said in Ecclesiastes what we quote in gratitude: "Of making many books there is no end."

A wise man is strong; yea a man of knowledge increaseth might. Prov. 24: 5.

School and Home

BACK again to school; vacation is over, and teachers and pupils are thronging with bright, rested faces and eager gladness to the familiar class-rooms. It may be the little red schoolhouse on the hill, with a stove in the corner, and a blackboard on the wall, and few appliances; but the red-cheeked country children learn many of life's best lessons from the painstaking little school-ma'am, who so energetically and patiently leads them into the intricacies of arithmetic, algebra and history. Some of our foremost men, those who are today conspicuous in the van of the country's progress, and at the helm of the State, had their first lessons in the little red schoolhouse.

It may be a grand city school, with marble stairs and iron railings and everything beautiful of which modern art can conceive, to which the children return. Nothing is more significant of the very genius of our republican America, than to see two thousand boys and girls, foreign-born children, or children in the second generation of foreigners, largely in the majority, all gathered for morning exercises in one of the great grammar schools. When they salute the flag, which they are taught to honor and revere, they are taking the first step towards loyal citizenship, and are being safeguarded against the insidious teachings of the Anarchist.

Private schools have taken a mighty forward stride in the last ten years, and the opportunities they afford for individual instruction are highly prized. The parent who cannot at home give time and daily care to his children when out of school, and who can afford the expense, does well to select the best academy or institute, and send his boys there, or his girls. The pupil who spends six or eight months in the year away from home without contact with the home people, is forced to a measure of self-government and self-reliance often lacking in home discipline.

One thing is, however, imperative, if children are to be rightly educated, and that is, wherever the school may be, parents and teachers should work in harmony. Too much home study should be deprecated. But, if home study is exacted, parents should see that it is tackled bravely, and finished thoroughly before children go to bed at night. In view of the children's tasks, their evening meal should be early, and if the father's business obliges him to return to a late dinner, he should not ask that the children's company be given him there. In a great measure, the most important thing in home life is the welfare of the children. They are coming on the stage which their elders must leave. These school days of theirs must soon be over. While they last, they should be utilized to the utmost, that from them the young people may emerge well prepared for the arena of life.

He commanded our fathers that they should make them known to their children; that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments. Psalm 78: 5, 7.

Street Angels

A STREET angel is an expressive up-country phrase, which is used to describe a man who is agreeable and genial to acquaintances and neighbors, while he is curt and contradictory at home. The man who forgets his good manners, and takes leave of his politeness when he crosses his own door-sill may be a street angel, but he is not far from being a home devil. When a wife lives in terror of her husband's fault-finding, and children scurry from their father, as chickens fly before a hawk, there is something dreadfully awry in the man's make-up, and the atmosphere under his roof is as poisonous as a malarial swamp. If any man, in an hour of honest introspection, is conscious that he is growing harsh, morose, unreasonable and despotic in his intercourse with the people at home, let him not fancy that this disposition to sullenness and gloom is condoned by smiles, handshakes and a general air of good fellowship to those whom he meets outside. Woe unto you street angels! At the best you are hypocrites and dissemblers. Try to regard the whole situation and be brave enough to acknowledge that you are in the wrong, and then, by God's help, turn over a new leaf. Praise the dinner, and notice the housewife's pretty decorations in the parlor. Pay the wife some of the delicate attentions which were hers to command when you were a lover. Treat your half-grown lad with the same consideration you show to another man, for man he will be before long. Help in the care of the little ones, and be a home angel in verity.

Husbands love your wives, and be not bitter against them; provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged. Col. 3: 19, 21.

The Wine Made at Cana

IN regard to what is said in the Bible concerning the use of wine, there is much confusion of ideas. To believe that the Saviour of the world would stoop to become a conveyor of intoxicating wine, is a subject that could be entertained only by one who has low ideals of that which is good. A little attention given to what the Word of God says on the subject, will dissipate the conclusions to which many have readily yielded.

There are seventy-one texts in the Hebrew Scriptures, giving warning and reproof against the use of intoxicating wine. Two illustrations will be sufficient:

(1.) Prov. 23: 31, 32. "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." Here, instead of any permission being given for the use of wine, we are told, not even to look upon it, and that because of its fermented condition and intoxicating power. "When it is red, . . . when it moveth itself aright, etc., and then also, we are warned as to its fearful consequences, "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

The Lord Jesus Christ, who foresaw how wicked men would undertake to justify themselves for indulgence in ways which, in other portions of his Word, he expressly condemns and gives warning against, has so arranged a detail of his first miracle, that he conveys, in its very setting, the truth that meets the fallacious arguments of these law days; for it is the nature of truth, to antagonize the false every age, and overthrow it. How admirably this is done is shown in the simple narrative of the miracle as recorded in John 2: 1-11.

The wine at the marriage feast had given out, and the mother of Jesus, conscious that he could supply a deficiency, had said unto the servants, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." Now, the mode of procedure on the part of Jesus forever sets at rest the blasphemous imputation that he could have anything to do with the making of intoxicating wine. Verse 6. Question: What did Jesus find there? Answer: "There were set there six water-pots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews." Verse 7. What did he tell the servants to do? "Fill the waterpots with water." With what? "With water." Did they fill them? How far? "Filled them up to the brim." Verse 8. What next did he say? "Draw out now and bear unto the governor of the feast." Verse 9. What did the governor say? "The ruler of the feast 'tasted' it." What did he say? "The water that was made wine." Did he know where it came from? Who did know? "The servants which drew the water knew." Did the governor of the feast know what good wine was in those days? "Yes, for he called the bridegroom and saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine, and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now." Then what was the good wine? "Wine made from water."

The only conclusion then that can be drawn from Scriptures in regard to wine, is, as the great Neander says, "That we are not justified in inferring that the water was changed into manufactured wine; but that Christ substituted his creative power for various natural and artificial processes that he intensified, so to speak, the powers of water in those of wine. Indeed," he adds, "this latter view of the miracle, conforms better to the spiritual import than the former. It is the peculiarity of the work of Christianity, not to destroy what is natural; but to ennoble and transfigure it the organ of divine powers."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Around the Home Hearth

Happy Days at Home

SOMETIMES wonder whether mothers fully comprehend the sweetness of the happy days at home, when the children are around them in the innocence of babyhood and early life. True, these are days of great care and of hard work, of constant vigilance, of much solicitude. Often there are sleepless nights, and the many illnesses which beset childhood: croup, measles, whooping cough, scarlet fever, come like threatening foes to the door, and must be met and fought. Nevertheless, the mother will never again know the deep, absolute contentment and bliss which are hers in the cradle; never again feel the pulse of triumph which beats when baby first walks alone. "Oh, little one," sang Longfellow, "that such long years must wander on through pain and tears;" but it is not of pain nor of tears that the mother thinks when the tiny toddler balances bravely, though unsteadily, on the unpled feet and sets off for the dizzy little journey across the floor. Parent birds fluttering over the fledglings when first they venture from the nest know something like this anxiety, this rapture, this watchfulness, which is so fraught with tender desire. When our boys and girls are grown up they may have troubles which cannot remove, and disappointments which shall be powerless to lessen, but in babyhood and childish years they are our very own; ours to cherish, to protect and shelter.

me, little one, a loving sister beckons. me safe across the level path, and see the prize, the sister very surely reckons, all lure and treasure in your bright eyes be. me, little one, there's only love that guides you; and love will guard, let whatsoever betide you.

Business a Renovator

Among the delusions it is difficult to uproot and dissipate from the ordinary mind is the fixed idea that, on the whole, business is a blessing in disguise, and does people more good than harm, if it does not kill them outright. A friend writes, "I am wonderfully well since my severe sickness of the spring. I suppose I needed it to make me over." As her case the malady was grip, which is a most prostrating and exhausting affliction, the fact that she has been better since her recovery is due, not to the illness, but to the rest of convalescence, to change of air and the consequent on a journey she has made since she lied, and to her living more carefully in accordance with the laws of health. Sometimes a patient who recuperates after a severe attack of fever, seems to enter on a new lease of life, and it is apparently as if a clogged chimney had been swept out, so clean and fresh are the organs which have been subjected to the fierce internal flames. But, could we investigate, one would discover that, not so much illness, but the chance overtaken nature has had, during the processes of recovery, to repair wastes and new devitalized functions and restore tissues, is the pelling cause of greater health. Most of us are spendthrifts of health. We recklessly make inroads on our capital. We drift into illnesses endlessly. We work and worry and rush into excesses which are far out of proportion to our strength, and when we are amazed when the hour of reprisal comes, nature is an exacting creditor and demands payment in usury for all her loans. It would be better for us, if we could pass through life without a single illness, if from the first glimmer of the last flicker of life's torch, the fire could burn with a steady and unfaltering glow. It would be a boon if children could escape wholly the string of diseases which attack them, and never lose a day with any ache or pain. Among the good things of the twentieth century it may possibly be that we shall yet be able to reckon unbroken health, with the good temper, the brave spirits, and the capacity for work, which such health will bring in its train.

If the Lord sends us illness, we must accept it as his appointment without a murmur. But all our illnesses are not sent by the Lord; they are merely permitted by him, and invited by our own folly. It is of his goodness that we are occasionally stronger after them; not because the illness is in itself a dispenser of benefits.

Mrs. McKinley

The President's sad fate has brought an unparalleled sorrow to the American people. When Lincoln fell by the hand of Wilkes Booth, the times were lurid with passionate excitement; it was the last dramatic scene in a fearful war. When, twenty years ago, Garfield was struck down, there was a personal grudge in the halfcrazed brain of the assassin. The dastard who struck William McKinley had not the shadow of an excuse for his infamous deed.

Abraham Lincoln left a widow, with a devoted son to care for her. Garfield left wife and children. Mrs. McKinley, in her fragile health, just recovering from an almost fatal illness, is childless and alone. The little graves in Canton, always flower-strewn by the mother's hand, have made her a life-long invalid. Now the brave, strong heart on which she leaned, the man whose devotion never failed her, whose last earthly act, crowning a life of the tenderest love, was to prepare her for the ordeal and strengthen her in her coming pain, and comfort her with "Nearer, My God, to Thee," is taken from her by God's will, and she is left alone. May all true hearts compassionate and pray for her. May every woman in the wide land think of her with love. May we, in our grief that we have lost the good President, consider with all tenderness and sympathy, the one who is most bereft, the wife, widowed; the lady who goes to her old home in Canton, with her life left to her and her great desolation. God comfort her, and take her in his holy keeping.

REST IN THE LORD

Rest in the Lord, and not in aught below,
Be firm in him, and in his tender care,
Leave everything that you are carrying, so
The Lord himself will all your burdens share.
MADELINE WILSON.

The Shortening Days

SO imperceptibly the seasons change that we waken some morning, surprised to find that autumn has come, and summer passed away. By the calendar, June, July and August compose the summer, but, by actual realization, in the temperate zone, September belongs to summer and December to the fall, for our rigorous winter does not set in until January. The shortening days are an indication of the year's progress which we cannot overlook. No longer are we having the lingering twilights when the day is so reluctant to go, but the darkness settles down early, and, little by little, the household gathers indoors, and settles itself to evening occupations. The children have their home work to do for school next day, their maps to draw, their sums to copy, and though the parents have grown rusty, they are drawn in as helpers, and puzzle their heads over diagrams, problems, and long lessons, and bedtime comes before anyone is ready.

We older ones are very apt to think that the school-fashions of the present are very far in advance of our own, but are we right in this fancy? Maybe, in the little district school up country, there were not the modern improvements of the graded school of to-day; but, at least, the teacher was faithful and the pupils were diligent, and we learned enough to suffice thus far for all the practical needs of life. We find ourselves very stupid when we wrestle with the children's tasks, but our minds have been turned in other directions, and we cannot readily bring our attention to bear on phases of study which have grown unfamiliar. The children's home-work is a sad burden to many of us, in the shortening days. We shall do well not to worry over it, nor to fret ourselves needlessly. School tasks are important, as they prepare pupils for the responsibilities which shall crowd on us, when school days shall be over.

Losing Temper

The most foolish thing in the world is to lose one's temper. Of old the wisest of men said, "Better is he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." The person in authority who is self-controlled can control others—children, servants, and employees generally. No one can govern subordinates who is not able to govern himself. When one loses temper in the home, and says bitter things, in a hasty mood, there is sure to come an after-time of sorrow and repentance, and there is a hurt in the heart which may or may not last for years. There are scars that never cease to throb, though the old wound seems to be healed. Should death suddenly snatch hence a dear one, before pardon for some injustice had been sought and granted, the regret would never pass away.

AUNT PRUDENCE PAYSON'S CATCH-ALL

—MRS. I. S. You have had a long, useful and honorable life, and in the evening time it is light around your path. Your rule of doing what you thought best, and leaving it, is a good one.

—INQUIRING MOTHER. As the tree is in your own garden, just under your eyes, and the neighboring young people are in the habit of coming there for recreation, I see no harm in your daughter's entertaining a friend of her own age beneath it. As a neighbor's son, you, of course, are acquainted with him. Later in the season it will be too cold for outdoor pleasures, and the call will be made in your parlor. You, as a mother, have a right to step in and out of any place where your girls entertain friends. I cannot see that a few years hence the case will be different.

Rest your arms a little; just a week or two. Wash with PEARLINE—soak, boil, rinse the clothes—just as directed. Then go back to the old way—soap and hard rubbing on washboard, if you are willing. In any case you are better off—you are rested, and the life of the clothes is spared just that much.

Famine's Havoc in Shensi

THE REPORTS OF SUFFERING AND OF WIDESPREAD MORTALITY FULLY CONFIRMED—BETTER OUTLOOK NOW IN SHANSI PROVINCE

THE earlier reports of the terrible ravages of famine and fever in China have received ample corroboration in letters from workers of the China Inland Mission. These letters, just received in Toronto, Can., by the Secretary of the Mission Board, give a startling picture of the situation in Shensi province. Mr. A. Trudinger, writing from Chuh-chih, Shensi, July 11, 1901, says:

I am thankful to say I arrived here without any serious trouble or difficulty. On the road I found the people friendly. As I got further north, prices began to rise steadily, though in the hills the crops seemed very promising. But once out on to the Singan Plain, and everything was changed, the whole place seems parched and dried up. . . . The people look thin and haggard; many dying and dead lie about, and living skeletons, such as one saw in photos of the Indian famine, are not at all infrequent. The houses and villages, too, that one passes, have an air of desolation and decay. Many dwellings have been pulled down for the sake of the timber, and many others and whole villages in places are quite deserted. In the market towns and cities, too, the streets seem empty, business is stagnant, and most shops only have one or two shutters down, or are closed altogether, on account of the number of beggars and thieves that hang about the doors.

The reports that one heard as to deaths from starvation are only too true. It would be hard to give any estimate as to numbers just yet, but from what I gather, the winter time, from the tenth moon last year, to the beginning of the third moon this year (namely from November—December to end of April), was the worst time. In Feng-siang, they say the dead were being carried off the streets day and night. In Mei-hsien, a dozen or more were found each day, and the boy in charge of the Mission station there, says that hardly a day passed without one or more being found dead on the steps in front of the house. Huge pits were dug outside many towns and cities, in which the dead paupers were thrown, and they are still being used. This is, of course, apart from the number that died in their own homes. In the second month (March to April), the Emperor ordered the grain in the granaries to be distributed, and that afforded a measure of relief for a time, though now most of them are empty. But famine fever is raging everywhere, and I think the number of deaths must be as great as ever. It is no respecter of persons, and so the rich as well as the poor are dying.

Grain is from six to ten times as dear as in ordinary good times, the prices being higher the further east one goes.

As to the prospects, unless rain soon falls, the outlook is appalling. If rain falls soon, the land can still be sown; but if not, there seems to be no hope for the next ten months, and the famine must be really only begun. I am told that a few days ago it rained in Singan and to the east, and I sincerely hope it is so. We pray daily and continually that God would spare the people in these parts.

In Mei-hsien sickness has been very prevalent, nearly every family among the Christians has had one or more ill, and Mr. Li, the evangelist, has been called to his reward. He died of famine fever three weeks before my arrival. In Cheo-chin the Christians don't seem to have met regularly for worship. I am afraid the spiritual state here and at Feng-siang of the Christians is not very high.

I intend to stay in Mei-hsien during the hottest part of the season. I hope to visit Singan later on.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has also received, from the China Inland Mission, the translation of a letter sent by the native pastor and elders of the Christian churches of Shansi to Rev. Mr. Stevenson, July 25. The letter says:

We are glad to inform you that at present all the churches in Shansi, through God's goodness, are now enjoying a time of peace, owing to the efforts of the Governor T'sen, who has sent instructions to all the officials in his jurisdiction to put down the persecutors and protect the Christians. All persecution has ceased, therefore you need not be anxious about us.

Referring to the Famine Fund, on the last month of last year, we received through T'sien-pao-chen, the sum of 1,500 taels, and we therewith proceeded to distribute the same among the Christians in P'ing-ang-fu district, in accordance with the arrangements made by Mr. McKie and the brethren there. Then again in the first month of this year, we received another instalment of 2,000 taels. On this occasion, Mr. T'sien and Deacon Li invited us over to the city, to consult about the distribution of this amount, and it was decided it should be distributed among the Christians in the district of P'ing-ang-fu, Luh-an-fu, Sih-cheo Ta-ning and Kih-cheo, altogether about twenty-six or twenty-seven places, fearing that the money would not extend further than the places mentioned. However, we felt that the Christians in the north of the province should have a little, too, and we therefore telegraphed to Shanghai, asking whether if there were more famine relief to be sent, we might distribute it among the natives in the north of Ling-shih, where there were a few "tens" of places, and also in Uind'eng district, in the south.

On June 6, Elder Hsu returned from Shanghai, bringing with him about 3,000 taels for famine relief, and after consultation together, we decided that those who had not already received relief, should now receive a large share. Moreover, the Governor T'sen, was desirous to give a sum of money to help the people, and decided that the Christians should first be relieved, as he feared many of them would die of starvation after what they had passed through, so he consulted with Chut-wen, a church member in T'ai-yuen, and decided to give 40,000 taels to be divided among the Christians, and Mr. Chu was to be responsible for its right distribution.

The wheat that was sown last year, did not spring up. Owing to the drought not a single grain could be reaped by nine-tenths of the people. In the fourth moon, (i.e. from May 18th to June 15th), a little rain fell, and the people were able in some places to sow a little autumn crop, but for want of more rain, what did spring up has been all destroyed. Alas! the people in Shansi have met with both famine and sword; consequently large numbers of them have died. This is manifestly God's judgment upon them! On the other hand, we are glad to say that the Christians have been protected and preserved by our heavenly Father, none have died of starvation. The church members who had land, clothing or other things, sold them, and so were able to keep themselves alive. These did not receive any help from the famine funds, as they feared that those who had nothing to sell, might die of hunger. However, at the present time all are alike poor, and the greater number are trusting to the church for help to save their lives. We ask that, as soon as you receive this, you will kindly pray that the Lord might open up a way for us. There are at present 6,000 to 7,000 inquirers and members in connection with the China Inland Mission in Shansi, most of whom will be without food in the sixth and seventh months, i.e., July 16th to September 12th; but if God sends rain, then perhaps we will have a little hope in the eighth moon (September 13th to October 11th). [Since this letter was written, the C. I. M. has forwarded 15,000 taels for famine relief.]

Signed, SHI-TS'ING-LAN, SONG-CH'ANG-KENG, K'UH-UAN-I, HSU-PU-UI, LUI-PEI-TEH, REN-CHING-HSU, IANG-SI-IONG, HAN-CH'UN-T'AI.

President McKinley as a Singer

IN a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Ira D. Sankey, the well-known singing evangelist, says of the sacred song, "Sometime We'll Understand," which was sung as a solo in the rotunda of the Capitol on the occasion of the state funeral of President McKinley:

"It is a remarkable thing that this hymn was also sung in Scotland a few years ago at a great memorial service held at Edinburgh, on the occasion of the burial of the Duke of Clarence, eldest son of the king of England.

"President McKinley was a fine singer, and I am informed that he was very fond of our Gospel Hymns. When I met him recently in the White House, he gave me a hearty greeting, saying he had often attended our meetings, and had enjoyed both the preaching and singing. When I remarked that I had understood he was quite a singer himself, he said: 'No, I am not much of a singer, but when I do sing, I try to do it in the spirit.'

"On the following Sunday morning, two days later, at one of the large churches in New York city, he was represented in one of the leading New York papers as singing a hymn of worship at the top of his voice. Many around him were struck with the beauty and sweetness of his bass.

"Nothing has touched the hearts of all men throughout the world more than the sadly-sweet story of the great statesman trying to sing, with his dying breath, that grand old hymn of the Church, 'Nearer, My God, to Thee.' This old song has always been much loved, but from this time onward through the coming years it will stand forth as one of the most sacred and best-loved of hymns in our language. I do not think I shall ever sing it again without thinking of him who passed to his reward with the song-prayer upon his lips."

BISHOP WHIPPLE DEAD

An Apostolic Worker, the Friend of the Helpless and the Poor and the Champion of the Indians, Called to His Reward

ONE of the most picturesque figures in the United States and one of the most saintly men of modern times passed from among us, when, on September 16, the Right Rev. H. B. Whipple closed his brilliant career. No longer shall we see that tall form with its snowy hair in our pulpits, pleading for help in his wonderful work; no longer will our clergy hang with rapturous attention on the words of him whom they called "St. John of the Wilderness;" no longer will the Indians have the sure friend and valiant champion, to whom they gave the name of "Straight Tongue," to listen to the story of their wrongs and plead their cause against the rogues and despoilers in Washington. Bishop Whipple is dead, and thousands of whites, who owe their education and their spiritual standing to him, and thousands of Indians, who held him in almost idolatrous reverence, mourn their loss.

THE LATE RIGHT REV. H. B. WHIPPLE

Bishop Whipple had reached the ripe age of seventy-nine years. He began life at Adams, N. Y., and in his early manhood devoted himself to business and politics. But the great change came and the future bishop prepared for work in the Protestant Episcopal Church. After his ordination he labored at Rome, N. Y., and afterwards in Chicago until 1859, when he was elected Bishop of Minnesota. He set out at once for the field in which he was to do such magnificent work. It was a new diocese, without railroads and with huge sections undeveloped. So scattered were the cities he was expected to visit, that during the first years of his episcopate he traveled three thousand miles on horseback every year.

There were twenty-thousand Indians in his diocese, and at that time they were in a state of the most deplorable degradation.

The troubles preceding and during the war, and, for a decade afterwards, had so absorbed the attention of the Government and the public that base men had matters all their own way in dealing with the Indians. One of the earliest recollections of a clergyman, now well known in his church, was of going into Bishop Whipple's study one day and finding him on his knees, with tears running down his face, pleading with God for justice for his red-skinned friends. Eventually they learned to trust him and to love him, but at first they would not listen to his earnest pleading that they would give the agents no pretext for massacring them. In spite of all he could do, they rose in rebellion under the outrages to which they were subjected and retaliated with awful consequences to the whites and ultimately to themselves. Bishop Whipple made their cause his own.

A significant story is told of his interest in the Indian. He was hurrying through the streets of a city in which a clerical convention was held, and passed a distinguished brother clergyman without any sign of recognition. The clergyman, at their next meeting, took him to task, and Bishop Whipple apologized for his apparent discourtesy. "Well," said the clergyman, "I suppose I must accept your apology, but if I had been an Indian you would not have treated me so."

The good Bishop's work, however, was not all given to the Indians. He founded and obtained the endowment of three institutions, which have done immense good in the diocese. The Seabury Theological School, the Shattuck School for boys, and the St. Mary's Hall for girls, besides other minor institutions, attest the energy and devotion of this apostolic man.

A WELSH HYMN*

WE soon shall ascend from the desert
To dwell in the land of the blest;
Reclining in peace on God's bosom,
Our wearied, faint spirits shall rest.
And then find eternal redemption
From sin and affliction and pain—
Find endless delight in adoring
The love of the Lamb that was slain.

Reviewing from Salem's fair summits
The path through the desert made clear,
Our souls shall delight in recalling
The windings that made our career;
In gazing on tempests and terrors,
Grim death and the grave, vanquished foes,
Whilst we from their power are rescued,
Abounding in love and repose,

*A reader of this journal, Mr. Z. Evans, of Carbondale, Pa., sends the foregoing stanzas, (accompanied by the verses in the original Welsh). They are from a famous Welsh hymn, the translation being by the Rev. Thomas Hughes, Congregational minister of Cardiff. The hymn is very popular in Wales, being sung in most of the Churches.

GOLD IN THE FURNACE

Joseph, in Slavery and in Prison, Trusting in God

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHAT was it that occupied the heart of Joseph as he was brought, a slave, probably with much indignity and severity of treatment, into Egypt? Was he full of the sense of his deep wrongs, and overflowing with bitterness against his brethren and pity for himself? We in say with the most absolute certainty, No. We have Scripture for it: "His bow abode in strength," and that strength was not his own, his hands were "made strong by the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob." His communion with God, instead of growing less when he had no longer the help of his believing father and the influences of a godly home, grew more intense, because he leaned more fully upon his God; looking like Abraham and Moses, "not at the things which are seen,"—his wrongs and his trials,—but at the things

COFFEE FOR MOTHERS.

One Kind that Nourishes and Supplies Food for Mother and Child.

"My husband has been unable to drink coffee for several years, so we were very glad to have Postum Food Coffee a trial and when we understood that by long boiling it would bring out the delicious flavor, we have been highly pleased with it.

"It is one of the finest things for nursing mothers that I have ever seen. It keeps up the mother's strength and increases the supply of nourishment for the child if partaken freely. I drank it between meals instead of water and found it most beneficial.

"Our five-year-old boy has been very delicate since birth and has developed slowly. He was white and bloodless. I began to give him Postum freely and you would be surprised at the change. When any person remarks about the great improvement, we never fail to tell them that we attribute his gain in strength and general health, to the use of Postum Food Coffee, and this has done many friends to use it for themselves and children.

"I have always cautioned friends to whom I have spoken about Postum, to follow directions in making it, for unless it is boiled fifteen or twenty minutes, it is quite tasteless. On the other hand, when properly made, it is very delicious. I want to thank you for the benefits we have derived from the use of your Postum Coffee." Mrs. W. W. Earnest, 179th Ave., Helena, Mont.

which are not seen," the absolute faithfulness of his God. Brought down to Egypt, he was bought from the Ishmaelites by Potiphar, the captain of the guard. "And the Lord was with Joseph." This would not have been the case if Joseph had failed to walk with God under the stress of the great trials through which he had passed.

Such a man is a very unusual man, and people who may hear hundreds of sermons untouched will be moved by the sight of such. The heathen, who are totally ignorant of God, are conscious that something more than man is present when they come in contact with one with whom God is. "The Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian. And his master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hand." Heathen people, when missionaries come to them, are of course full of their own superstitions, and generally begin by thinking themselves right and the missionary wrong. He tells them of things they cannot see or hear or touch; how do they know that these things are so? But when they see the proof, in the lives of these men, that a living God in whom they trust makes them love their enemies and return good for evil, when they have power to return evil for evil; when they see that wisdom and strength are given to these men which is above nature, then, like Potiphar, they know there is a living God; they have seen him with his people.

The Lord made all that Joseph did to prosper. Joseph had come into the inheritance of Abraham's blessing: "I will bless thee, and be thou a blessing," and he wanted only to fill the place to which God had called him, so that he, being blessed of God, should become a blessing. He had accepted "the pit" from the hands of God, not from his brothers; he now accepted slavery also from the hands of God, not from the hands of Potiphar, and already God made him to be a blessing. All that he did God made to prosper, and his master "put all that he had under his hand. And God blessed Potiphar's house for Joseph's sake." Was not this the beginning of the fulfillment of his dreams?

Just when we seem most prosperous God sends us the greatest trials. Potiphar, incensed against Joseph, cast him into prison. This was the heaviest blow which had yet fallen upon him. Up till now his reputation had been intact, but now that it was blasted, what remained to him? His God, whom he still trusted without wavering.

Joseph had not retaliated when he was cast into the pit. When he was sold into slavery he had accepted all from the hands of God. Would he now accept a ruined reputation and an undeserved prison? Did his suffering make him wonder how God could permit such wrong? No; the first record of his prison life is: "But the Lord was with Joseph, and showed kindness unto him"—when no man had a kind word for him—"and gave him favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison." The same Presence which had shone in Potiphar's house, could not be extinguished, because of the false charge against him, in the prison. "The keeper of the prison committed to Joseph's hand all the prisoners that were in the prison; and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. The keeper of the prison looked not to anything that was under his hand, because the Lord was with him, and that which he did, the Lord made it to prosper." Joseph could not but rule, even in a prison. He was meek, and the meek inherit the earth (Ps. 37: 11 and Matt. 5: 5).

Having left his reputation with God, he was not absorbed by his own great trials, but had a heart at leisure from itself. To soothe and sympathize.

Two of Pharaoh's household servants were in prison—the chief butler and the chief baker. Joseph could not be indifferent to the sufferings of others. His brethren could be callous and heartless towards them, for they had not suffered, but he could not be heartless even towards a heathen. These two men, each of them dreamed on the same night, and in the morning they were sad. The presence of a man of God brings God near to the unsaved members of the household. It was a real concern to Joseph that these men were sad, and he inquired the reason. "We have dreamed a dream," they said, "and there is none that can interpret it."

Joseph replied to these men: "Do not interpretations belong to God?" He would seize every opportunity to make known the greatness and the wisdom of the God whom he served. And he begged these two prisoners to tell their dreams. The same God who had made Joseph's dreams such a reality to him, gave him also the clue to the prisoners' dreams, and he prophesied the restoration of the chief butler to his office. Joseph saw what he thought was an opportunity of helping himself, and said to the chief butler: "But think of me when it shall be well with thee, and show kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house, for indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews, and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon." It was the first trace of self-help which appears in the history of Joseph, and it did nothing for him. But the chief butler forgot Joseph, and two years more must pass in this severe school, while "the Word of the Lord tried him."

DARK DAYS*

Affliction May Come as Discipline, or as a Call to Duty, but Always Comes in Wisdom and Love

SINCE the days of Job, and apparently long before, men have been trying to solve the problem of suffering. The common belief concerning it, as we see from the speeches of the three "comforters," was that loss of property, the death of children and personal affliction were punishment for wrongdoing. This conclusion was not affected by the fact that affliction sometimes befalls men esteemed for their integrity and piety. The uncharitable deduction in such cases was that the sufferer was really a bad man, but was clever enough to hide his iniquity from the eyes of men; but God, seeing all things, detected him and punished him. In Job's case that was the inference drawn and, as his affliction was exceptionally severe, it was assumed that it was made so to punish him for adding hypocrisy to his secret sin. The writer of the book explains the secret, and we are informed that the affliction was merely a test, to prove that Job would be as faithful in adversity as in prosperity. In spite of this explanation and of the possibility that the same, or some other reason equally consistent with the sufferer's integrity may account for his affliction, there is still a tendency to regard trouble as a sign of the divine displeasure. The sufferer himself sometimes so regards it, and wonders in what way he has offended God and forfeited his claim to his favor and protection.

Ideas of this kind ought not to be admitted either by the sufferer or his friends. There are, of course, cases in which the affliction is the direct result of sin or negligence. A father, broken-hearted by his son's wickedness, may remember that he was so engrossed in business, or pleasure, when his son was a boy, that he neglected to correct his faults or to train him in the way he should go. A man stricken down with disease may remember some imprudence or violation of natural law which has brought on the disease. A man brought to destitution in his old age may recall errors of judgment, or inattention to sound business principles, or lack of foresight which accounts for his poverty. The man who sows the wind reaps the whirlwind, even though he may be a Christian. But there are in these cases and in others, in which it is difficult to trace the affliction to any known fault, considerations which ought not to be overlooked by the sufferer or others. He ought not to abandon himself to self-reproach, nor should his friends reproach him. He ought rather to humble himself before God, and ask that whatsoever the reason of his trouble may be, he may learn the lesson it is designed to teach. Least of all should he charge God with failure to keep his promises, or say, with Naomi, "The Lord hath dealt very bitterly with me." We may be quite sure that our afflictions are not the result of chance or caprice or vindictive power, but are sent for a wise and loving purpose. It ought to be clearly and firmly settled as a fact never to be doubted by any godly man, that his heavenly father loves him, and in all that befalls him has a purpose which is intended to bring good in some way.

We are short-sighted mortals at the best, and even yet, after all the lessons of history, and of our own personal experience, are far from understanding God's ways. We see much of them in nature and in providence, but all that we know is the mere fringe of the garment in which he appears to men. It is, however, conceivable that affliction is sometimes sent purely as discipline. It may be necessary in certain cases that a child of God should learn by affliction, that neither on riches, nor honor, nor health does his well-being depend. It may be well that he should know that, stripped of everything, God's grace is sufficient for him. We are apt to think that happiness depends on outward circumstances, but many have learned by painful experience that they can be happy even in poverty and sickness. That lesson is worth learning at the cost of suffering. Or there may be a community which needs an example of patience and fidelity to God under trial. Some dearly-loved child of God may be appointed to set such an example, and affliction may be laid on one whom God can trust, in order that the lesson may be learned by friends and acquaintances. So, the Christian may have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, bearing trial as Christ did, for the good of others. Or, it may be that some great duty lies ahead, and in order to fulfil it, some man may have his character so purged and strengthened that when the emergency comes, he will be ready to perform it. Germany might have waited long for her Bible if Luther had not been seized and imprisoned in the Wartburg. The world might never have had the Pilgrim's Progress if John Bunyan had not been shut up in Bedford jail. In one way or another, God fashions human character and brings his own designs to pass. Who is the Christian that he should murmur under trouble? He was bidden to expect it, and his duty is to bear it cheerfully, in the assured conviction that God knows what he is doing, and will support him in trial.

The Singing Woodman

AS THE CHRISTIAN HERALD frequently publishes accounts of remarkable conversions, I venture to send in the history of one which impressed me as most interesting and edifying. Mark Lee is a woodman, a laborer in the forests of northern Pennsylvania, where he is but one of the large army of people who come annually from other places to these forests. In the spring-time they fell trees and peel bark; in the winter time they cut logs, and then there is the rafting to be done on the streams. This man, accustomed to all the ways of lumbermen in the forest-cabins, was addicted to almost all their vices, such as swearing, drinking, playing cards, etc. He had a magnificent voice and was accounted a splendid singer. He was by no means careful as to the character of the songs he selected for the entertainment of his audiences; mingling hymns with ballads of doubtful propriety and questionable purity. I give the substance of his narrative in his own words, as nearly as I can recall them:

"Upon one occasion, after my return home from the forests, one of my neighbors died. I was asked to go and bring to the house of mourning, a relative of the deceased living some eight miles away. She was a humble, sincere Christian woman. The night after our arrival was spent, according to custom, in what was called 'waking the dead.' I was asked to sing; I sang everything that 'was at all proper on such occasions; and then a few comic and somewhat questionable ballads, as I thought, to dispel their gloom. The funeral over, I consented to convey the old lady to her home. On the way, after a long silence on her part, I asked why she was so quiet?

"Her reply was: 'I have been thinking. It makes me so sad to know that you, having such a fine voice, such a good gift from God, should use it as you commonly do, to his dishonor and the undoing of yourself and others. Oh, that your voice were sanctified to serve him who gave it to you. How much good you might do!'

"These words pierced my soul, but I strove to make light of them, and to jest away their effect. But she looked so sad! I saw the tears standing in her eyes, though she said nothing more. Our journey was completed in silence.

"On my way back home, I could not get rid of her words. I thought of the harm my singing did in many instances, and was for the first time conscience-stricken about the ill use I had made of my gift. I could not ease my mind, though I tried by singing, and even swearing, to do so. Nor did her words depart from me, until I resolved I would seek God's pardon. At a meeting then in progress in a church near my home, I presented myself at the 'Mourners' Bench' for several nights in succession: there, and in secret prayer, I strove, until Christ spoke peace to my soul. From that moment, my voice and all that I am or have has been laid on the altar of my Saviour's service. That gentle little woman's words and tears brought me to my Saviour."

His life, as I know it, is a constant attestation of the genuineness of his conversion. (REV.) CHAS. L. STREAMER.

BOXES OF GOLD.

Sent for Letters About Grape-Nuts.

30 boxes of gold and greenbacks will be sent to persons writing interesting and truthful letters about the good that has been done by the use of Grape-Nuts food.

30 little boxes, each containing a $10 gold piece, will be sent the 10 writers of the most interesting letters.

30 boxes each containing a $5 gold piece to the next 20 most interesting writers, and a $10 gold piece will go to each of the 300 next best.

A committee of three not members of the Stum Co. will make decision between Dec. 1 and 10th, 1901.

Write plain, sensible letters, giving detailed facts of ill health caused from improper food and explain the improvement, the gain in length, in weight, or in brain power after using Grape-Nuts food.

It is a profound fact that most ails of humanity come from improper and non-nourishing food, such as white bread, hot biscuit, rich and uncooked cereals, etc.

A change to perfectly cooked, predigested food like Grape-Nuts, scientifically made and containing exactly the elements nature requires for building the delicate and wonderful organs of brain and body, will quickly change a sick person to a well person. Food, good food, is Nature's strongest weapon of defense.

Include in the letter the true names and addresses, carefully written, of 20 persons not known to you, to whom we can write regarding food relief by Grape Nuts.

Almost everyone interested in pure food is anxious to have his or her name in the papers, such help as they may offer the human race. A request, however, to omit name will be respected. Try for one of the 330 prizes.

Everyone has an equal show. Don't write empty, but just honest and interesting facts about the good you have obtained from the food Grape-Nuts. If a man or woman has found a true way to get well and keep well, it should be a pleasure to stretch a helping hand to humanity, by telling the facts.

Write your name and address plainly on letter and mail promptly to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

TAPS

LIGHTS out! The march is ended,
The soldier's rest is won;
His latest fight is over,
His long day's work is done.

An afterglow of brightness
Enfolds that bivouac
Where last he watched and waited;
There's glory on his track.

Wherever peril met him,
He faced it, in the van.
Through strife and toil and hardship,
God's masterpiece—a man!

To-day in thronging cities,
In lonesome solitudes,
In mining camps and workshops,
In depths of tangled woods.

Wherever men are striving,
Wherever women pray,
There's mourning for the soldier,
Who sleeps so sound this day.

There's mourning of the nations,
Far off they moan their grief;
There's mourning in our households,
For him, our fallen Chief.

Lights out. The march is over,
The last long battle won!
In presence of his Captain
He hears the words, "Well done!"

Lights out. Farewell, our Great-heart!
Lights out; our hot tears fall.
This one, our banner covers,
This was our best of all.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

"A Believer," Rich Patch, Va., writes:
I am thankful to my Heavenly Father for casting a new blessing into my life by answering an earnest prayer.

M. B. S., Yonkers, N. Y., writes:
I have been praying for three years for a dear one who had wandered away from God. God is answering my prayers. There is a change in my dear one, and I feel sure that all will be well in God's own good time.

C., Nortonville, Kans., writes:
Have received answers to prayers for the safe keeping of my dear sons. I wish to speak of this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, because the "Answers to Prayers" have been such a help to me. I hope this may help others.

C. H. P., Evanston, Wyo., writes:
For twenty-one years I prayed that my husband would become a servant of God. Last spring he was happily converted. My six children are Christians, in answer to prayer. Many blessings have come to me because I asked of God and he gave.

R., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:
I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer. For many years I prayed for a special gift from God; my prayer is answered, and now, with Hannah of old, I rejoice in God, my Saviour. I will trust the Lord as long as I live. I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.

Mrs. P. R. G., Cable, Wis., writes:
Recently, I was about to visit my old home. My husband was very anxious to accompany me, but as we live on a farm it seemed impossible for us both to leave; but I prayed to the Lord, if it might be his will, to make the way clear. The way was opened, and we made our visit to our parents in their old age.

S. A. E., Ithaca, N. Y., writes:
I have been a reader of your paper for about six years. It has helped me in my Christian life. I am specially interested in the department devoted to "Answered Prayers." Not long ago I was in great anxiety, but prayed in faith. Before night my trouble was all made right. No one but the Lord could have made it so. Another time, when rising from earnest prayer, I happened to notice the time by the clock. Soon after, I got a message which showed me that my prayer was answered most wonderfully, that which I had asked for had come to pass almost at the very time I was pleading for it. "Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear."

A., Louisville, Ky., writes:
These words have greatly comforted and sustained me: "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths" (Prov. 3: 6). Indeed he has directed my paths. Where the way was most rugged and shadows most sombre, where I felt my own inefficiency most keenly, and knew that I had exhausted my every resource and all my own power, and that I was helpless as a little child, I have cried unto the living God, and he has held my hand and guided my feet; the light of his countenance shone upon me, and the burden was lifted from my heart; I sang songs in the night and praised his glorious name.

PREVENTS CROUP.

Stops Coughing—Bronchitis—Laryngitis.
Children who wear the Egyptian Throat Band cannot possibly have croup. It not only prevents croup, stops colds and coughing, but prevents further attacks. Equally beneficial to adults. It consists of a silk band with a pouch containing an Oriental powder possessing rare medicinal virtues. The virtues of the powder are absorbed by the natural heat of the body, and act upon the pulmonary passages, freeing them from the effects of exposure. Doctors recommend this band and it is strongly endorsed in the United States Health Reports.

20 DAYS FREE TRIAL

State the age of child or size of neck, and we will send you a band by return mail. Give it a thorough test for 20 days. If it proves satisfactory send us $2.00 and keep the band. If not, return to us the band and pay nothing. Don't delay. Order one to-day on 20 days' free trial.

A HOUSEHOLD NECESSITY

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Family Washer

Saves Time, Money and Worry—Most Perfect, Simplest Washer Known—No More Stoopng, Rubbing, Wearing Out or Boiling of Clothes

A FAIR AND SQUARE PROPOSITION.

In order to prove to the most skeptical that the "1900" BALL-BEARING FAMILY WASHER is unquestionably the greatest Home Labor-saving machine ever invented, we will without deposit or advance payment of any kind, freight paid, on 30 DAYS TRIAL. If you like it, you can pay for it either in cash or on the installment plan at the end of the 30 days' trial. If you don't like it, all you have to do is to ship it back to us at our expense. You run no risk, no expense, no obligations whatever.

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer is unquestionably the greatest labor-saving machine ever invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. There are no wheels, paddles, rockers, cranks or complicated machinery. It revolves on bicycle ball-bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required, a child can operate it.

No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Hot water and soap all that is needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in six minutes. Impossible to injure the most delicate fabrics. Saving in wear and tear of clothes, to say nothing of the saving in soap and materials, pays for machine in a short time. Don't be prejudiced. This is entirely different from, and far superior to any other washing machine ever made.

Read These Convincing Testimonials:

A DAY'S WASH IN 3 HOURS.

SHERWOOD, MD., Jan. 15, 1901.
The washer I received from you is the best I ever saw. It will do all you claim for it. I can do the washing in three to four hours, where it took a colored woman a whole day to do it. We have ten boys and three girls, and you can judge from that, that we have large washings. Myself and daughter would not part with this machine for twice what it cost. We live on a farm.

MRS. LEVI H. HARRISON.

GREASY OVERALLS WASHED CLEAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 25, 1899.
Gentlemen: I received the washing machine in good order on the 15th inst. My wife had saved three weeks' washing to try it. She commenced washing at seven o'clock, and at eleven all the clothes were on the line. It would have taken two days to do all this work the old way; and the washing was done clean. Greasy overalls, which I use in the engine room, could not have been done better in a steam laundry. She would not part with the washer if she could not get another like it, if she was offered $100.

Yours truly, CHAS. BLUM, Marine Engineer,

15 MACHINESFUL IN 4 HOURS.

CHICAGO, July 13, 1900.
Last week I started to wash with your 1900 Ball-Bearing Washer. A neighbor saw me wash my little boy's waists (which were terribly dirty) and we were both surprised to see there was not a spot left. On Monday we did a big wash of 15 machinesful and the work was done in 4 hours. It is the best machine I ever saw (and I have tried many). It works so easy that my little boy can run it.

After a thorough trial of your 1900 Washer on all kinds of washing, I think you have a "wonder." We have a very large washing, and have always had two women on Monday and one to finish on Tuesday. Our washing cost us $10 per month. With your washing machine, our cook and the yard boy did the washing in 4 hours, much better than it was done before. Your washer is all you claim for it.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. These questions are printed Four weeks in advance so as to afford our readers an opportunity to answer them.

II. For answers to the questions which appear below, when accepted, we will allow compensation for the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append their name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Oct. 30

1. Who was the mother of Mary, the mother of Jesus, and where is the information to be found?

2. What is the duty of "shut us" toward the church, and how can that duty be best performed? Also what is the duty of church and pastor toward the "shut in"?

3. In what sense are we to understand Christ's word to his mother (John 2: 4): "Woman, what have I to do with thee?"

4. In the case of a strike, such as that of motormen on the cars, would a Christian working man who is unemployed, be justified in offering to take the place of a striker?

5. In the management of church affairs, should the man who contributes little or nothing to the support of the church have as much power as he who contributes liberally, presuming that both are members in good standing?

Questions of the Week

1. To what extent may a Christian read novels? Where should the line be drawn, assuming, of course, that there are works of fiction that are really profitable?

Those novels that simply amuse are dangerous, for our literary tastes are acquired, and we unconsciously drift in this manner of reading. We must realize that the best works of fiction are much like bee-hives, from which the honey must be carefully extracted, or a sting will be received. The good or evil influence of novels, largely depends then upon the reader. In this day of trustworthy reviews, it is quite possible to reject the decidedly evil, while those chosen should be criticized by our own conscience. The line should be drawn around the boundary set by a true desire to read only that which will make us more Christ-like. W. P. S.

Our one supreme mission is to further the cause of Christ, and all our energies should be bent in that direction. Since God has called us to be his peculiar people, we have no time to read works of fiction, which merely amuse for the moment, but should aim to read only those books which make a permanent and beneficial impression, and which help us to serve Christ more faithfully. It would take a lifetime to read all the standard novels, and even these contain much that is impure and defiling. It is, of course, a foregone conclusion that no Christian can read books of that nature. But even among books which are not impure, there are many which we should avoid. Novels, as a class, give a false and fanciful idea of life, and their tendency is to unfit their readers for practical, every-day Christian life. In short, any book which is not positively beneficial, should have no place in the Christian's library. He has no time to waste on merely "harmless" books, which exert no influence either way. W. CASWELL.

2. Where was the first public library of the world located and when, and what were the circumstances that led to its establishment?

Public libraries existed in the remotest ages to which archaeological research has penetrated, so that it is impossible to determine which of them was first established. The ancient people of Accad and Shumir, in the Tigris and Euphrates valley, had such libraries in their chief cities even before the Semites conquered the land, the books being clay tablets inscribed with cuneiform characters. About 3800 B.C., soon after the Semitic conquest, Sargon I., classified and translated into the Semitic tongue the old Accadian literature, and founded or enlarged great libraries in the principal cities of Chaldaea. In the ancient city of Nippur there was a great temple library, in which have already been exhumed over 25,000 tablets, whole or broken. In the seventh century, B.C., Assurbanipal caused the old Chaldaean libraries to be ransacked, and copies or translations of the old tablets made, and these he placed in a great library at Nineveh, containing probably about 10,000 tablets. This is especially known to be a public library, from an inscription in which the king declares that he placed the books in his palace for the instruction of his people. It seems also to have been conducted very much like a modern library. R. HULL.

3. What led John Howard to devote himself to temperance reform?

John Howard, the morning star of prison reform, was born near London, England, in 1726. In 1771, he visited parts of Great Britain and Ireland, and on his return from the latter place, he visited Bristol. Here he was taken ill, and suffered from a severe attack of gout for six months. During his sickness he determined to abstain from the use of wine and other alcoholic beverages. This total abstinence pledge he kept till the day of his death. In 1773, he was made Sheriff of Bedfordshire, an appointment which gave him authority over the county jail. In seeking to reform its abuses, the first thing that excited witnesses, to testify in open court, should be so modified that they may suffer no embarrassment. This necessity is a primary cause of lynching, and should be obviated. Second, heavy damages should be assessed against the county permitting a lynching, the amount to be divided between the victim's relatives and the State school fund. Property-owners would then become interested in opposing mob-violence, and their influence would be strongly felt. Third, sheriffs and other officers should lose their offices in disgrace, and be made ineligible to hold any political office of trust or profit in the future, when not making reasonable resistance to a mob before surrendering a prisoner. Few weak surrenders would take place under such a statute, and mobs, knowing their danger, would be fewer and less daring. Fourth, law and order societies should be formed in all communities where mob violence is possible, to assist the officials and oppose lawlessness. The better class of citizens would readily enrol in such associations, and, alone, their influence would decrease lynching seventy-five per cent. Fifth, the masses should be taught by every available means that lynching is never profitable, but always the reverse; that mob-law does not lessen, but encourages crime; that it degrades and criminalizes the perpetrator and disgraces his community and nation; and that if our institutions are to endure, the law must be re-

Love is undoubtedly the more potent two, and there is no conversion into it does not enter to a greater or less degree, which is more than can be said of fear, alone would not make a good Christian; it is not a good motive, for guilt and self-interest are its parents, and yet, in many instances, it may be the primary incentive that leads to a turning away from sin. This, however, is not uniformly the case as in its place there may be a self-loathing born of the slavery of sin, or a yearning for something better—something divine—begotten of contact with the Truth and true Christians. Whatever it is that has brought about the desire for a change of heart, in the drawing of men to Christ, there is concerned, principally, the realization by us of God's love as manifested in Christ, and with our acceptance of that love, with its consequences, there is born within the heart the love that "casteth out fear."

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. T. D., Lexington, Ky. With regard to foreigners settling here, can they legally retain their titles in this country?

If they wish to become citizens, they cannot do so and retain their titles. At the time of application, they must make explicit renunciation of all hereditary and other titles.

M. E. T. Is the Christian life an easy or hard one?

It is a very delightful life, but it has difficulties and sometimes its penalties. A man may be placed in such circumstances that his family, or his business, that consist of Christian principle involves him in persecution and continual annoyance. The Christian life in his case may be a very hard one. There are some persons with strong propensities to evil, who must struggle daily and hourly against their own natures, if they are to be true to Christ. They find the Christian life a hard one. But they have compensations in the sweet peace and loving rest which Christ imparts, enabling them to go on their way rejoicing, even in tribulation. To others, in varying degrees, the Christian life is comparatively easy. Men of spiritual culture and surrounded by Christian friends find it a continual delight. But howsoever a man may be situated, it is the best life, because it belongs to the higher nature and it leads to the highest development.

J. McM., Detroit, Mich. Do you think the rainbow dates from the Flood, or from the foundation of the world? The question was raised in this city on account of a picture being exhibited, called "The Garden of Eden," and here was a rainbow in it.

Any answer must be mere speculation. Some scientists and Bible scholars have ventured the opinion that up to the time of the Deluge, the earth was enveloped in mist, which obscured the sun's direct rays, and had copious dews, instead of showers, fed the soil. After the Deluge, when the direct rays of the sun shone upon the world for the first time, the first rainbow appeared, the whole surroundings of the globe having undergone a remarkable change. (See Genesis 2: 5, also Genesis 6: 17, and 7: 4, and 9: 13.)

H. J. M., N. Y. Address it to the name of the paper, and it will be delivered.

Reader, N. Y. It is not imperative that son should pay his father's debts. The individual use of honor must guide in such cases. Speaking generally, we should say that where such a debt is practicable, it should be followed from motives of filial duty as well as justice.

Frank F. Barton, Oregon. We believe a man can serve God as faithfully, and derive as much spiritual benefit from the prayerful study of his word while tending sheep on the mountains, as though he were living in a great city. Amos, the prophet, was "the herdsman of Tekoa."

J. McM., Detroit, Mich. The words "Jehovah Tsidkenu" mean "The Lord my righteous one." Authorship of hymn uncertain.

Bill, Brooklyn. 1. Cost of plant, rent, interest, and depreciation, have all got to be reckoned in making such a calculation. Even then, the workers' share might be larger than it is. 2. There seems to be no limit, legal or otherwise, to the profit that may be claimed under such circumstances.

Sunday School Teacher, Brooklyn, N. Y. and others. Your suggestion that we print the text of the Sunday School Lesson on the page of comments, we are obliged to decline. It would involve curtailing the exposition, which is already too short. Besides, it would encourage a habit, too common, of reading only the verses assigned, instead of the entire passage connected with the lesson, which sometimes covers several chapters. The teacher should always read this in the Bible, so as to make his lessons intelligible and show the sequence of them.

THE RED LETTER BIBLE

THIS EDITION of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, unchanged save for the variation of color in the type. Two colors (red and black) are employed, in accordance with the following simple plan:

- I. In the New Testament, the words printed in red are those that are universally accepted as the utterances of our Lord and Saviour.
- II. In the Old Testament, the passages in red are those that were quoted by Him, or that have direct relation to incidents to which He referred.
- III. Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.
- IV. A RED star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament, indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ.

Here the actual words, quotations, references and allusions of Christ, not separated from their context, nor in a fragmentary or disconnected form, but in their own proper place, as an integral part of the Sacred Record, stand out vividly conspicuous in the distinction of color. The plan also possesses the advantage of showing how frequently and how extensively, on the authority of Christ himself, the authenticity of the Old Testament is confirmed, thus greatly facilitating comparison and verification, and enabling the student to trace the connection between the Old and the New, link by link, passage by passage. It sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfilment of the promise of all the ages.

his attention was the awful amount of drunkenness that existed among the prisoners. The jailer kept a bar on the premises. Each person who was admitted as an inmate of the prison celebrated the event by purchasing a bowl of punch, for which he had to pay six shillings. Afterwards Howard set out to visit other prisons in many parts of England, where he found drunkenness so alarmingly common that riot and pandemonium reigned among the inmates daily. Wicked men usually paid money to the Sheriff for the privilege of keeping jail. Liquor selling furnished a large revenue. On one occasion, when visiting the Marshalsea Prison, London, he found that on a certain Sunday the prisoners purchased six hundred pots of beer! All these things led Howard, not only to be a total abstainer, but to devote the remainder of his life to the cause of temperance reform. J. J. MUNRO.

4. What is the best method of stopping the lynching and burning of human beings in certain parts of the Union, keeping in view the fact that in many cases great provocation exists?

First, court procedure should be so quickened and simplified that justice may be at once satisfied. The present tardiness of the law is an incentive to mob revenge. The legal profession should endeavor to have the present procedure revised, that justice may be rapidly served; and legislatures should pass laws making more adequate the penalties for certain crimes. The necessity, in certain cases, of women having, as prosecuting spected. Lastly, an earnest endeavor should be made to educate the mass of the race against which lynch law is usually directed, according to the method of Mr. Washington and others, that it may rise in usefulness and virtue. Racial prejudice will then grow weaker and weaker, and causes for lynching will disappear. JAMES BELL MAJOR.

5. Is fear or love the most frequent influence in leading men to become Christians?

I believe fear is the more frequent influence. The average evangelist of to-day may differ on this; for if he preaches a very emotional sermon on the love of God, and then asks for a show of hands from all who wish to become Christians, he may count more hands than when he preaches about Sinai's Law, and the result of breaking that law; but if we ask the Christian people individually, I believe the majority will answer that it was through fear that they were led to the Lord. And it is the Bible way; for "By the law is the knowledge of sin," and "Sin is the transgression of the law," and "The wages of sin is death." Now when people realize this, then the fear of death will constrain them to seek a way of escape. Love is more a result, and comes after we have accepted Christ; for when we realize from what we have been redeemed, then is when we love the most, and can understand something of God's love; as also in the Bible, the chapters on love were mostly written to Christians, while those on the law and sin were mostly written to the world or the unregenerate. ARRIVAL OF PRINCE CHUN AND SUITE AT BERLIN RAILWAY STATION

THE BODY-SERVANTS OF HIS IMPERIAL HIGHNESS, PRINCE CHUN

THE PRINCE PASSING THROUGH THE ORANGERIE AT THE PALACE

PRINCE CHUN'S MISSION OF EXPIATION

NEW international incidents arising out of the siege of Peking have attracted so much attention throughout the civilized world as the expiatory mission of Prince Chun (or Tschun) to the Emperor of Germany. During the early stages of the troubles in Peking, and immediately before the Legations were besieged and assaulted by the xers and the riotous Chinese populace. Baron Von Ketteler, the German Ambassador, was brutally murdered in the streets of the city.

That crime started the war, and as details were revealed, showing the need to have been of most atrocious and inexcusable barbarity, feeling on the Continent, and especially in Germany, ran high. There was a loud demand throughout Kaiser's dominions for vengeance. After the war, one of the first official acts of the young Emperor, Kuang-su, was to communicate to the German Emperor his wish to send to the latter a pal messenger, who should personally bear the expression of China's great sorrow, and tendering guarantees for the future as the German Emperor might command. Prince Chun, the brother of Emperor Kuang Su, was chosen as the messenger. After many delays, the Prince and suite arrived at Hamburg early in September. Then arose a question which, for a time, was the subject of much discussion in Berlin. Such a mission as that of

In Prince Chun's entourage or suite, are included his barber, tailor, doctor, and private secretary, besides several high officials. On September 4, the party reached Potsdam, and rode in open carriages to the new palace. With the Prince sat Yin Tschang, the Chinese Ambassador to Germany. In four other carriages were the Chinese interpreters and Major von Luttwitz. On reaching Muschel Hall, they were ushered into Imperial master. I was sent to Germany to express his Majesty's most heartfelt sympathy over the foul death of Baron von Ketteler. I am in a position to assure your Majesty that our Emperor has banished those people who brought such great trouble upon China and loss and sorrow upon Germany. The Emperor took upon himself the entire blame, and to me has fallen the task of declaring the innermost wish of His Majesty and of all the royal family, that your royal house may flourish, and that prosperity, health and good fortune may abide with you. The Emperor of China requests that the grievances you have suffered may be overlooked, and he hopes that after everything is explained, the Germans and the Chinese will understand each other better and will take better means of protecting each other's interests. This is also my own heartfelt wish.

Emperor William replied with much dignity. He said, substantially:

Not a happy cause, nor the fulfillment of a polite act of courtesy has brought your Imperial Highness to me; but rather a sad and very serious occurrence. My minister at the court of the Emperor of China, Baron von Ketteler, was foully murdered with a deadly weapon, wielded by an imperial Chinese soldier in the capital of China, at high behest—an unheard-of crime, which violated and outraged all civilized customs and usages. From your Imperial Highness' mouth I have just now heard an expression of the sincerest and deepest regret of the Emperor of China, because of this occurrence; and I will gladly believe that your Imperial Highness' imperial brother personally was not a party to the violence against the embassies of foreign countries and peoples. The advisers of his government have, therefore,

PRINCE CHUN AND HIS SUITE

1. Maj.-Gen. Von Hopfner, Commander 31 East Asiatic (German) Infantry Brigade. 2. Secretary Wang Kuan. 3. Dr. George Mark (German), Secretary of Legation. 4. Liu Tso Kuei, Secretary. 5. Gen. Yin Tschang, the newly appointed Ambassador to Berlin. 6. Maj.-Gen. Richter, Commander 17th Infantry (German) Brigade. 7. His Imperial Highness Prince Chun. 8. Chih Ko, Interpreter. 9. Chang Yin-Man, Vice-President of Ministerial Council. 10. Liang Cheng (called Lu Chuntzang), Secretary of Legation. 11. Attache. 12. Baron von Luttwitz, Major on General Staff.

Prince Chun was unknown, in modern Europe at least. In Oriental lands, the chief participant in a mission of this character would be expected to abase himself, "kowtow" knocking his forehead on the ground, and literally crawling like a despised worm, as he nears the royal stool. Emperor William knew that to subject Prince Chun to so degrading an ordeal would serve no good purpose; and besides that, it would make the Prince despised in his own land. To the Prince's intense relief, the Emperor sent to him at Hamburg, a message to the effect that the "kowtowing" would not be insisted upon.

the Kaiser's presence. With the Emperor were Crown Prince Frederick, the other princes of the royal family, the members of the nobility, State Secretary, Ministers, Cabinet officials and military officials. The ceremony was simple, yet impressive. Prince Chun, escorted by Major-General von Hopfner, advanced, saluted the Emperor after the Chinese manner, with folded hands, and tendered him a manuscript written upon yellow silk. Then addressing the Emperor, he said in substance:

I have the honor of placing into your most kingly hands this most valuable document, in obedience to the wishes of my

the greater guilt. These people must not imagine that they are receiving forgiveness for their crime through this expiatory visit, but rather will it depend upon their future behavior, in acting in accordance with civilized customs and usages whether they be forgiven. If the Emperor of China will hereafter strictly regulate his government in accordance with these usages, he will fulfil the hope that the sad results of the misunderstandings of the past year may be effaced, and that lasting peace and friendly relations may obtain between Germany and China again as heretofore.

As Prince Chun left the hall, his face was beaming with pleasure over the result of the audience.

The Crystals

TEXT --- Job 28: 17:

"The crystal cannot equal it"

MANY of the precious stones of the Bible have come to prompt recognition. But for the present I take up the less valuable crystal. Job, in my text, compares saving wisdom with a specimen of topaz. An infidel chemist or mineralogist would pronounce the latter worth more than the former, but Job makes an intelligent comparison, looks at religion and then looks at the crystal, and pronounces the former as of far superior value to the latter, exclaiming, in the words of my text, "The crystal cannot equal it."

Now, it is not a part of my sermonic design to depreciate the crystal, whether it be found in Cornish mine or Hartz mountain or Mammoth Cave or tinkling among the pendants of the chandeliers of a palace. The crystal is the star of the mountain; it is the queen of the cave; it is the eardrop of the hills; it finds its heaven in the diamond. Among all the pages of natural history there is no page more interesting to me than the page crystallographic. But I want to show you that Job was right when, taking religion in one hand and the crystal in the other, he declared that the former is of far more value and beauty than the latter, recommending it to all the people and to all the ages, declaring: "The crystal cannot equal it."

In the first place, I remark that religion is superior to the crystal in exactness. That shapeless mass of crystal against which you accidentally dashed your foot is laid out with more exactness than any earthly city. There are six styles of crystallization and all of them divinely ordained. Every crystal has mathematical precision. God's geometry reaches through it, and it is a square or it is a rectangle or it is a rhomboid, or in some way it has a mathematical figure. Now, religion beats that in the simple fact that spiritual accuracy is more beautiful than material accuracy. God is not an Anarchist. Law, order, symmetry, precision, a perfect square, a perfect rectangle, a perfect rhomboid, a perfect circle. The edge of God's robe of government never frays out. There are no loose screws in the world's machinery. I believe God's geometry may be seen in all our life more beautifully than in crystallography. Job was right. "The crystal cannot equal it."

Transparent Religion

Again, I remark that religion is superior to the crystal in transparency. We know not when or by whom glass was first discovered. Beads of it have been found in the tomb of Alexander Severus. Vases of it are brought up from the ruins of Herculaneum. There were female adornments made out of it three thousand years ago—those adornments found now attached to the mummies of Egypt. A great many commentators believe that my text means glass. What would we do without the crystal? The crystal in the window to keep out the storm and let in the day—the crystal over the watch, defending its delicate machinery yet allowing us to see the hour—the crystal of the telescope, by which the astronomer brings distant worlds so near he can inspect them. Oh, the triumphs of the crystals in the celebrated windows of Rouen and Salisbury! But there is nothing so transparent in a crystal as in our holy religion. It is a transparent religion. You put it to your eye and you see man—his sin, his soul, his destiny. You look at God and you see something of the grandeur of his character. It is a transparent religion. Infidels tell us it is opaque. Do you know why they tell us it is opaque? It is because they are blind. "The natural man receiveth not the things of God because they are spiritually discerned." There is no trouble with the crystal; the trouble is with the eyes which try to look through it. We pray for vision. Lord, that our eyes might be opened! When the eye-salve cures our blindness then we find that religion is transparent.

It is a transparent Bible. All the mountains of the Bible come out: Sinai, the mountain of the law; Pisgah, the mountain of prospect; Olivet, the mountain of instruction; Calvary, the mountain of sacrifice. All the rivers of the Bible come out: Hidekel, or the river of paradisaical beauty; Jordan, or the river of holy chrism; Cherith, or the river of prophetic supply; Nile, or the river of palaces; and the pure river of life from under the throne, clear as crystal. While reading this Bible, after our eyes have been touched by grace, we find it all transparent, and the earth rocks, now with crucifixion agony, and now with judgment terror, and Christ appears in some of his two hundred and fifty-six titles, as far as I can count them—the bread, the rock, the captain, the commander, the conqueror, the star, and on and beyond any capacity of mine to rehearse. Transparent religion!

The providence that seemed dark before becomes pellucid. Now you find God is not trying to put you down. Now you understand why you lost that child, and why you lost your property; it was to prepare you for eternal treasures. And why sickness came, it being the precursor of immortal juvenescence. And now you understand why they lied about you and tried to drive you hither and thither. It was to put you in the glorious company of such men as Ignatius, who, when he went out to be destroyed by the lions, said: "I am the wheat, and the teeth of the wild beasts must first grind me before I can become pure bread for Jesus Christ." Many things you will have to postpone to the future world for explanation, but I tell you it is the whole tendency of your religion to unravel and explain and interpret and illumine and irradiate. Job was right. It is a glorious transparency. "The crystal cannot equal it."

Perfect in Symmetry

I remark again that religion surpasses the crystal in its beauty. The lump of crystal is put under the magnifying glass of the crystallographer, and he sees in it indescribable exquisiteness—snowdrift and splinters of hoar-frost and corals and wreaths and stars and crowns and constellations of conspicuous beauty. The fact is that crystal is so beautiful that I can think of but one thing in all the universe that is so beautiful, and that is the religion of the Bible. No wonder this Bible represents that religion as the daybreak, as the apple-blossoms, as the glitter of a king's banquet. It is the joy of the whole earth.

People talk too much about their cross and not enough about their crown. Do you know that the Bible mentions a cross but twenty-seven times, while it mentions a crown eighty times? Ask that old man what he thinks of religion. He has been a close observer. He has been cultivating an æsthetic taste. He has seen the sunrises of a half century. He has been an early riser. He has been an admirer of cameos and corals and all kinds of beautiful things. Ask him what he thinks of religion, and he will tell you, "It is the most beautiful thing I ever saw. The crystal cannot equal it."

Beautiful in its symmetry. When it presents God's character it does not present him as having love like a great protuberance on one side of his nature, but makes that love in harmony with his justice—a love that will accept all those who come to him, and a justice that will by no means clear the guilty. Beautiful religion in the sentiment it implants! Beautiful religion in the hope it kindles! Beautiful religion in the fact that it proposes to garland and enthrone and emparadise an immortal spirit. Solomon says it is a lily; Paul says it is a crown. The Apocalypse says it is a fountain kissed of the sun. Ezekiel says it is a foliated cedar. Christ says it is a bridegroom come to fetch home a bride. While Job in the text takes up a whole vase of precious stones—the topaz and the sapphire and the chrysoprasus—and he takes out of this beautiful vase just one crystal and holds it up until it gleams in the warm light of the eastern sky, and he exclaims, "The crystal cannot equal it."

Oh, it is not a stale religion, it is not a stupid religion, it is not a toothless hag, as some seem to have represented it; it is not a Meg Merrilies with shrivelled arm come to scare the world. It is the fairest daughter of God, heiress of all his wealth. Her cheek the morning sky; her voice the music of the south wind; her step the dance of the sea. Come and woo her. The Spirit and the Bride say come, and whosoever will, let him come. Do you agree with Solomon and say it is a lily? Then pluck it and wear it over your heart. Do you agree with Paul and say it is a crown? Then let this hour be your coronation. Do you agree with the Apocalypse and say it is a springing fountain? Then come and slake the thirst of your soul. Do you believe with Ezekiel and say it is a foliated cedar? Then come under its shadow. Do you believe with Christ and say it is a bridegroom come to fetch home a bride? Then strike hands with your Lord and King while I pronounce you everlastingly one. Or if you think with Job that it is a jewel, then put it on your hand like a ring, on your neck like a bead, on your forehead like a star, while looking into the mirror of God's Word you acknowledge, "The crystal cannot equal it."

Wonderful by Transformation

Again, religion is superior to the crystal in its transformations. The diamond is only a crystallization. Carbonate of lime rises till it becomes calcite or aragonite. Red oxide of copper crystallizes into cubes and octahedrons. Those crystals which adorn our persons and our homes and our museums have only been resurrected from forms that were far from lustrous. Scientists for ages have been examining these wonderful transformations. But I tell you in the Gospel of the Son of God there is a more wonderful transformation. Over souls by reason of sin black as coal and hard as iron, God, by his comforting grace, stoops and says: "They shall be mine in the day when I make many jewels."

Now, I have no liking for those people who always enlarging in Christian meetings about their dissipation. Do not go into the particulars, my brothers. Simply say you were sick, but make no display of your ulcers. The chief stock in trade of some ministers and Christian workers seems to be their early cases and dissolutions. The number of pockets you pick and the number of chickens you stole make very poor prayer-meeting rhetoric. Besides that, it discourages other Christian people who never got drunk or stole anything. But it is pleasant to know that those who were farthest down have been brought highest up out of infernal serfdom into eternal liberty. Out of darkness into light. From coal to the solitaire. "The crystal cannot equal it."

But, my friends, the chief transforming power of the Gospel will not be seen in this world, and not until heaven breaks upon the soul. When that light falls upon the soul then you will see the crystals. With a magnificent setting for these Jewels of Eternity!

I sometimes hear people represent heaven in a way that is far from attractive to me. It seems almost a vulgar heaven as they represent it, with great blobs of color and bands of music making a deafening racket. John represents heaven as exquisitely beautiful. "The crystal cannot equal it." In one place he says: "Her light was as a precious stone, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "I saw a pure river from under the throne, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "Before the throne there was a sea of glass clear as crystal." "The crystal cannot equal it." John says crystal atmosphere. That means health. Balm of eternal June. What weather after the world's east wind! No rack of storm clouds. One breath of that air will cure the worst tubercle. Crystal light on all the leaves. Crystal light shimmering on the topaz of the temples. Crystal light tossing in the pines of the equestrians of heaven on white horses. But "the crystal cannot equal it." John says crystal river. That means joy. Deep and ever rolling. Not one drop of the Potomac or the Hudson or the Rhine to soil it. Not one tear of human sorrow to embitter it. Crystal, the rain out of which it was made. Crystal, tubed over which it shall roll and ripple. Crystal, its white surface. But "the crystal cannot equal it." John says crystal sea. That means multitudinously vast. As vast in rapture. Rapture vast as the sea, deep as the sea, strong as the sea, ever changing as the sea. Billows of light. Billows of beauty, blue with skies that were never clouded and green with depths that were never fathomed. Arctic and Antarctic and Mediterranean and Atlantic and Pacific in crystalline magnificence. Three crystals. Crystal light falling on a crystal river. Crystal river rolling into a crystal sea. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

Effective Non-Resistance

"Oh," says some one, putting his hand over his eyes, "can it be that I who have been in so much sin and trouble will ever come to those crystals?" Yes, it may be—it will be. Heaven we must have, whatever we have or have not, and we come here to get it. How much must I pay for it?" you say. You will pay for it just as much as the coal pays to become the diamond. In other words, nothing. The same Almighty power that makes the crystal in the mountain will change your heart which is harder than stone, for the promise, "I will take away your stony heart and I will give you a heart of flesh."

"Oh," says some one, "it is just the doctrine I want. God is to do everything and I am to do nothing." My brother, it is not the doctrine you want. The Gospel makes no resistance. It hears the resurrection voice in the mountain and it comes to crystallization; but your heart resists. The trouble with you, my brother, is the coal wants to stay coal.

I do not ask you to throw open the door and let Christ in. I only ask that you stop bolting it and barring it. My friends, we will have to get rid of our sins. I will have to get rid of my sins and you will have to get rid of your sins. What will we do with our sins among the three crystals? The crystal atmosphere would display our pollution. The crystal river would be befouled with our touch. Transformation must take place now or no transformation at all. Give us full chance in your heart and the transformation will be downward instead of upward. Instead of a crystal it will be a cinder.

Britain's Future King and Queen Greeted by the Dominion...

CANADA'S ROYAL VISITORS

A Memorable Conclusion to a Tour Around the Globe

WHILE our own land is for the time draped in the sable emblems of sorrow for our fallen President, our neighbors in Canada—who have pressed the most cordial sympathy with us in our bereavement—are enjoying the exhilarating experience of a royal visit. After well nigh circling the globe, the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York are now engaged in visiting the principal cities of the Dominion, and are being feted and entertained by the various municipalities in a style of becoming magnificence. Addresses, receptions, levees, illuminations, and various other forms of entertainment have kept the visitors exceedingly busy, and the hospitalities of the loyal Canadians seem to be inexhaustible. Not since 1860, when the Prince of Wales, a slender youth, set foot on Canadian soil, has there been witnessed such a universal display of loyalty throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. All Quebec turned out to welcome the distinguished visitors, who landed at that port from the royal steam yacht Ophir on September 16. The Duchess was tall, graceful, dignified; the Duke, ruddy and bronzed, from his long sea voyage. Extensive arrangements had been made in advance, and Dominion and municipal committees were appointed to give suitable greeting. 3,000 persons watched the brilliant procession from the landing-place. Addresses were delivered by the Lieutenant-Governor of Canada and the Mayor of Quebec, to which the Duke made suitable reply. In the course of his remarks, he paid a glowing compliment to Canadian loyalty. State dinners, illuminations, receptions and military parades marked the sojourn at Quebec. Various points of interest were visited. Their greeting at Montreal was no less enthusiastic. A pavilion erected near the station the Duke and Duchess received the address of welcome. The gathering here was a most distinguished one, including the Earl of Minto, Governor-General of Canada, and Lady Minto, Lord and Lady Strathcona, Sir Wilfrid Laurier the Premier, and Lady Laurier, and many official and military dignitaries. Fifty veterans of the South African War received medals from the Duke's hand, and a delegation of Indians, in all the glory of war paint and feathers, was presented. On receipt of news of President McKinley's death, a great part of the festivities arranged by the Montreal authorities was abandoned, the royal visitors desiring to mark their sympathy for the United States in the great bereavement. Among other incidents of the Montreal visit were the conferring of the degree of LL.D. upon both the Duke and Duchess by McGill University, the formal opening of a new medical building, an inspection of the royal Victoria Hospital, and the reception by the Duchess of an address from the National Council of Women. At Ottawa, the Dominion Capital, the Duke and Duchess found a most exuberant welcome. Ten thousand school children waving flags and singing the national hymn, were ranged along the walk from the railway depot to the Houses of Parliament. At the gate of that historic pile of buildings the Duke, in replying to a municipal address, made reference to the great progress made by the Dominion during the last forty years, since the visit of his father. He believed that the two races in Canada would continue more than ever to co-operate in building up the Dominion. The Duke is a good speaker, and his able and well-chosen remarks won him applause.

They passed a day among the lumbermen, made a trip on the "slides," and led a procession of Indian war canoes down the river to Rockcliffe, where a carnival of backwoods sports was held for their entertainment. Then followed a grand reception in the Senate Chamber.

According to the programme, the royal visitors will travel by rail and steamer over seven thousand miles on Dominion soil, stopping at each of the following places: Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Vancouver, Victoria, Toronto, Niagara, Kingston, Brockville, Sherbrooke, St. John and Halifax. On October 21 they will sail from Halifax for England. Since setting out upon their world-circling tour, the Duke and Duchess have visited almost every British possession on the globe. On March 16 last, they sailed from Portsmouth, England, on the steam yacht Ophir. They visited successively Gibraltar, Malta, Port Said, Aden, Kandy (in Ceylon), Singapore and Melbourne (Australia). At the latter port, on May 9 last, the Duke opened the first Parliament of the Southern Commonwealth in the Exhibition Building, before an audience of twelve thousand people. Sydney, Brisbane, New Zealand and Tasmania were next visited, then the tourists sailed for Mauritius, after which they steamed to Durban and Cape Town. From the latter port they sailed on August 23 for Canada. The Duke, everywhere, took occasion to thank the Canadian people for the help rendered to the Empire in the war in South Africa. It was evident that the loyal and enthusiastic service had made a deep impression on the royal mind, as was to be expected. The ties which bind the great Dominion to the mother country have been so loosened of late years in deference to the growth and development of the country, that the loyalty displayed, both in the brilliant service in the war, and in the welcome to the heir-apparent and his wife, is peculiarly acceptable. It is an emphatic answer to the pessimists who predicted that the concessions granted to the Dominion would lead to separation from the Empire. The people who thronged the streets cheering the royal couple, the decorations and illuminations of public buildings and private houses, as well as the speeches of the statesmen and public officials, all testified to enthusiastic loyalty to the crown and flag.

Everywhere the tact displayed by the royal pair has been conspicuous, and the interest they have taken in the development of the countries they have visited, shows that there is hearty appreciation of these colonial jewels in the British crown. In the course of nature, the Duke will one day be the wearer of that crown, and can have no better preparation for the duties and responsibilities it will bring, than such a visit as he is now paying to the outlying portions of the Empire of which he will be the ruler. He has visited Canada twice before, but then it was as a younger brother of the heir to the throne. Now he sees it in a different aspect and with new responsibility.

Forty-one years ago, in 1860, Albert Edward, then Prince of Wales, and now King of Great Britain, visited Canada, and was received with the greatest enthusiasm throughout the Dominion. His son, the Duke of Cornwall and York, who is now the guest of the Canadian Government, sees a land which has undergone great changes since his father's visit. In 1860 Canada's provinces were divided, much of its vast territory was but sparsely peopled, and there were in all not more than 2,000 miles of railways in operation. To-day the royal visitors find it a united and populous Dominion, in cordial union from sea to sea, rich in commerce and agriculture, with over 18,000 miles of railways, great ship canals and modern transportation facilities.

It is stated that on his return to England, the Duke will be invested with his father's former title of Prince of Wales. This is in accordance with the precedent set nearly 600 years ago by Edward III. with his son, the Black Prince.

THE GREAT DEMONSTRATION IN MONTREAL

INTERIOR OF THE CHAPEL WHERE THE PRESIDENT WORSHIPS

REV. JOHN M. SCHICK

EXTERIOR OF GRACE REFORMED CHAPEL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S CHURCH

By WALDON FAWCETT

OWING, possibly, to the multiplicity of interests with which President Theodore Roosevelt has been identified ever since his entrance into public life, the stanchness of his religious beliefs and his interest in church work have not been so widely known, perhaps, as in the case of some of the Chief Executives who preceded him. The fact remains, however, that the new Chief Magistrate is a member of the Dutch Reformed Church, and has throughout his career taken a very material interest in the welfare of the denomination.

President Roosevelt has always made it a rule to attend divine service at least once on Sunday, where it was at all possible, but very frequently he has been denied the privilege of worshipping in a church of his own denomination. This was the case during the time he lived in Washington as a member of the United States Civil Service Commission, and also during the interim of his service at the national capital as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Roosevelt made some inquiry, and being unable to learn of the existence of any Dutch Reformed Church in the city, attended from time to time various churches of the other denominations.

Immediately after his election to the Vice-Presidency, however, Mr. Roosevelt made arrangements to become a member of the congregation of Grace Reformed Chapel, at the corner of Fifteenth and O streets. This chapel is of the German Reformed denomination, but the tenets of the Dutch Reformed denomination, of which the President is a member, are so nearly identical with those of the German Reformed sect as to make either entirely acceptable to a member of the other denomination. President Roosevelt has stated that he would gladly have worshiped at Grace Reformed Chapel during his earlier residence at Washington had he known of its existence, but ascertaining that there was no Dutch Reformed Church in the city, it did not occur to him to make inquiry regarding a branch of the sister denomination. The church of which he will henceforth be a member, was brought to his attention in rather an interesting manner. Immediately after the election of McKinley and Roosevelt, Rev. John M. Schick, the pastor of Grace Reformed Chapel, wrote a congratulatory letter to each of the successful candidates, and, in closing, casually invited Mr. Roosevelt to worship with his congregation. Almost immediately he received a note, in which the Vice-President expressed his pleasure to learn of the existence of a church of his faith in Washington, and accepted the invitation to become a member of the congregation. Accordingly, on the Sunday after the Inauguration last March, the Vice-President and his family attended service at the chapel. Since his accession to the Presidency, Mr. Roosevelt has again indicated that he would make the chapel his spiritual home while in Washington.

Grace Reformed Chapel is one of the least pretentious churches in the city. The edifice is of brick, and has seating capacity for but 150 persons, being much smaller than old St. John's Church in Washington, where almost all of the early Presidents worshiped. The President's pew is the fourth from the front on the right of the centre or main tier—relatively the same position occupied by President McKinley in the church which he attended during his occupancy of the White House. The Roosevelt pew is indicated in the accompanying picture by a palm-leaf fan placed in an upright position.

Dr. Schick, the pastor, is a scholarly man, fifty-three years of age, and assumed his present pastorate in February of last year. He is a native of Virginia, having been born in Richmond, but his collegiate and theological education was obtained in Pennsylvania. He served as pastor of several different churches in Pennsylvania and Ohio before coming to Washington. Dr. Schick is a pleasing and rather eloquent speaker, whose courses give evidence of thought and careful preparation. His address at the memorial services for the late President McKinley, held at his church, attracted considerable attention by reason of the beauty of the sentiments presented.

Almost from the time that he took up his present duties, it has been Dr. Schick's ambition to enlarge the present church building or to erect a new and larger edifice, but when clergymen and others who knew of his longing in this direction, have written lately, expressing the opinion that by reason of the increased number of persons who will wish to attend the church, it would be an opportune time to further the project, the pastor has only replied that he could not take advantage of the death of President McKinley, whom he admired very much, to build up the church, and that the matter will have to take its regular course.

At the same time, the pastor holds to his original determination to provide a new building as soon as the way is opened, and there is hope that the cornerstone may be laid next May, when the denomination holds its annual meeting in Baltimore. Many of the members may be induced to come to Washington for the occasion. The plan is to erect a one-story structure covering a ground space fifty by one hundred feet in size, and which would have a seating capacity of at least five hundred persons. The estimated cost of the building is $30,000.

President Roosevelt has always been an advocate of strict Sunday observance. On one occasion, when he was a guest at a ranch in the far West, some persons proposed a hunting expedition on Sunday. The President politely but firmly refused, and when one of the men present, evidently mistaking his motive, sought to assure him that the circumstance would never get to the ears of the public, he remarked, dryly: "My dear fellow, I find that the best way to keep out of trouble is not to do anything that could make trouble. Then you do not need to tell any lies."

AN EMINENT PREACHER GONE

Sudden Death of Dr. George T. Purves, Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York

CHRISTIAN people of all denominations will sympathize with the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York in the bereavement it has suffered. The blow is all the more severe because it was so unexpected. Dr. Purves was apparently in his usual health, but was really feeling unwell, but not so seriously as to cause alarm to himself or his family. It was, however, deemed prudent to consult his physicians. Two of them called on the evening of September 24, and while they were examining him the pastor complained of a pain at the heart. Attention was given to it at once, but it grew worse, and he shortly expired.

Dr. Purves was in the prime of life. He was born in Philadelphia in 1852. He studied at Princeton, and was licensed to preach in 1876. His first charge was at Wayne, Pa. Subsequently he settled at Baltimore, Md., and afterwards became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Pittsburg. In 1892 his own university invited him to occupy the chair of Church History. Dr. Purves declined, but was ultimately induced to accept the chair of New Testament Exegesis, combining with it the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church. It was only last year that, at the urgent solicitation of the Fifth Avenue Church in New York, he consented to become the successor of the lamented Dr. John Hall. His pastorate, though so short, has been wonderfully successful.

THE LATE DR. GEORGE T. PURVES

He retained the deep interest in young men which characterized his work at Princeton, and at the time of his death was preparing a course of lectures which were to have been delivered at Harvard at its next term.

Dr. Purves was a prominent speaker at the Ecumenical Missionary Conference last year. Never did his critical acumen and philosophic spirit appear more impressively than in the paper he read on, The course the defence of Christianity should take, in view of the development of missions in heathen lands. He showed, with wonderful power, how Christianity embraces every good element that is found in other religions while proving by its incomparable superiority its divine origin.

One of Dr. Purves' latest pulpit utterances was his sermon on the late President. In view of his own death, there is no sad pathos in the following words he then used: "Stricken down while in perfect health, called upon to give up all the great opportunities before him without a sigh, and then to go down with unfaltering faith in God, in Christ, and in heaven—that is the spectacle which our honored Executive has given his country and to the world. As he said, not our will, but God's will, be done. Passing away without a tremor, exhibiting a sublime Christian faith, a faith which was his own, and in which, as I believe, he truly was a true representative of the American people."

Aunt Jean

"Not to be ministered unto but to minister"

BY
Edith Ferguson Black.

CONVALESCENCE at last. A beautiful girl lay back on her pillows and looking pleadingly in the face of the nurse who bent over her, said: "How I wish you did really belong to us."

"Why, sweetheart?" the question ended a rare, swift caress.

"Because then we should have a right keep you, and could treat your arguments of humanity's need and all the dra heads of that tiresome old 'Duty' with contempt."

"Peace, my child! Remember what Phillips Brooks tells us: 'Do not pray for thy lives. Pray to be stronger! Do not say for tasks to be equal to your powers, say for powers equal to your tasks.' Now take these drops and let me read to you to sleep." The deft fingers lifted to her lips the potion they had been mixing while she talked, and then arranged the patient luxuriously among her cushions. The girl looked up at her beseechingly with tender eyes.

"Aunt Jean, I love you!"

"But do not need me. Peace, dear heart."

"But, dearest, we could make you happy—"

She laid soft fingers on the pouting mouth, while her heart telegraphed eyes and lips swift messages of love. The fire snapped softly from the polished andirons, the sun shed farewell kisses through the French windows, which fell lovingly upon cream draperies and made brilliant rainbows on the velvet carpet. Fine paintings, framed in golden leaves, hung on the richly papered walls; the world's best thought in crimson and cloth of gold looked down on her from massively carved shelves, the warm breath of flowers exhaled from antique vases, bits of rare china were and there, fancy chairs with careless foldings of lace, and the curious couch with its dainty five clock and no less dainty occupant, into whose cheeks the flush of health was creeping, and who had grown so strangely dear. Then the room which was her solitary resting place when off duty bare from infrequent occupancy, still with a sense of its own desolation, and making no attempt to medley its gloom, against whose windows the rain pattered and the wind howled, and over whose door the raven memory of "What might have been" croaked its dismal dirge "Nevermore!"

She stood with clasped hands in the quick falling January twilight, the firelight glinted on her soft gray dress and lit up her wondrous crown of silver hair, until the brown eyes and mobile mouth grew strangely still, then she lifted her face to heaven, "Life is—to do the will of God!"

Aunt Jean went to the office of a well-known physician and said simply: "I've come to report if you want me, Dr. Holenstein. Is there anything for me to do?"

"Oh, Miss Ritter! How more than glad am I!" and the overworked doctor led the way into his private sanctum and closed the door. "There is always work for you, as you know by experience, but this is a special case, and I have been at my wits' end to find someone I could trust with it. It is a complication, first cause phthisis consequent upon measles. I think I could bring the little chap through if I had anyone to depend on, but all the best nurses are engaged, and he needs constant attention."

"I am ready to go at once."

"Capital! My buggy is at the door, will you come?"

The doctor stopped at a house in one of the unfashionable quarters and preceded Jean upstairs through sickening mazes of disinfectants, while the house was shrouded in the gloom of approaching death.

"How are you now, Bobby? See what I've brought you—someone to make you well." The Doctor kept up a running fire of directions as he prepared his instruments. "Do exactly as you see me do, three times through the night. The trouble is I am called out of town until to-morrow. Poor little chap, I'm afraid it's an 'all up' case. Feed the milk freely with this iron and quinine mixed with it, as much of the beef tea as he'll swallow—there! I shall lose my train!" The Doctor hurried away, and Jean, taking up the little sufferer, held him in skilful arms, while the worn-out mother, for the first time in weeks, fell asleep with a smile.

"What spell do you exercise over your patients?" said Dr. Holenstein, as, after weary weeks of nursing, he stood with Jean "Forgive me, Doctor, if I seem morbidly headstrong, but we diagnose our own constitutions best sometimes, who lack the 'sheepskin'. Physical rest has always been a second thought with me."

He bowed. "Do you feel equal to a troublesome case?"

"They suit me best."

"Bravo! my Florence Nightingale; then I will give you one to-morrow which I promise will leave but little space for either time or thought."

The Doctor's promise was fulfilled. It was a trying case, as bad as even Aunt Jean could wish. But after some days and nights Aunt Jean's triumph, as usual, was achieved. Her patient lay watching her intently one day, and at last abruptly asked: "What made your hair so white?"

"Partly old age."

"Fiddlesticks! Don't you know you are beautiful? As I lie here and watch you, with your peaceful face and lovely,

Helen Davis tossed wearily among her pillows—"No one elects to be hampered."

"Probably the grain upon Araunah's threshing floor disliked the 'tribulum,' but it made a way of escape for the wheat."

"Bah! It makes me feel like Tennyson's 'Despair.' Do you remember?" In an exquisitely modulated voice she repeated the lines with passionate emphasis:

"O, we poor orphans of nothing,
Alone on that lonely shore
Born of the brainless nature
Who knew not what she bore!
Trusting no longer that earthly Flower would be heavenly fruit;
Come from the brute, poor souls—
No souls—and to die with the brute."

and Jean, lifting her brave face toward the sky, responded:

"We feel we are nothing—for all
Is Thou, and in Thee
We feel we are something—"

That also has come from Thee;
We know we are nothing,
But Thou wilt help us to be."

Then she answered a knock on the door, and took from the servant a silver salver, on which was a quaint dish of finest porcelain filled with dewy rosebuds on a dainty bed of maiden-hair, and laid it beside her patient.

"Are you not wilfully shutting out the light and choosing you, a darksome dwelling-place where bats do congregate?"

The only answer was an imperious wave of the thin hand, and the delicate porcelain lay shattered on the floor.

"My dear, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

"How dared you say that to me?"

"Because it is true."

The invalid flung her thin arms about Jean's neck. "You are the only one with strength of mind enough to tell me I am a fool!"

The weeks fled, and still Jean worked and prayed unceasingly over her despotically peculiar patient, who spent the days now on a low couch; even Jean had ceased to hope for anything more.

Very soft was her voice as she followed her nurse in the Psalms for the day. Then she continued, as she toyed with Jean's silvery crown:

"My dear, I have a confession and a prayer this morning. I wonder if you will grant it?"

"Confess to God, dear heart."

"I have and do. But it is only fair to tell you I am conquered. You don't know how I have been testing you all those weeks. I have tempted you with gold, and failed. You are impervious alike to wealth and flattery. For years I have wilfully blinded my eyes to the possibility of anything good in this dreary world, but your grand faithfulness has made me hide my miserable cynical head in the dust and cry 'Peccavi.' Now, dear, will you stay with me to the end? It will not be far off!"

For all answer, Jean folded her close, and time passed unheeded in the stillness.

"Some time before I go, I want you to tell me your life story. What makes me think you have one? How can I help it? Peace like yours is seldom gained without 'much tribulation,' and, believe me, I do not ask through idle curiosity."

Jean threw herself wearily on a couch in her little sitting room. All day there had been snow and rain, now an icy wind froze the drops and tossed them with stinging force into the faces of pedestrians; near by some children were busy practising a Christmas Carol, while now and then she could hear the cry of the newsboys as they shivered on their rounds. What a contrast it was to the day they had laid Helen Davis to rest among the flowers!

"AUNT JEAN, I LOVE YOU," SAID THE GIRL.

beside the little convalescent. "Here's Bobby thinks you an angel (and good cause he has for it too), and not one in the house but would go down on their knees to serve you."

"They overestimate me, Doctor, just as you do. Where shall I go next?"

The Doctor turned admiring eyes upon her. "Do you mean to go on guard again at once? My child, you must have rest."

"The world has need of workers, not of drones. I need to work, and prithree give it me." She dropped him a low courtesy and looked up at him with sparkling eyes. "Do I strike you as one whose system is run down?"

"Hercules cannot stand everything. Go out of town for the summer and next winter I will promise you all the work you want."

"I cannot!" and her hands closed convulsively on the dainty note received that morning from Muriel Hazelton, imploring her to spend the summer in her lovely home; "this summer specially," the note ran on, "for uncle Guy is coming from the West." "I cannot! I must have work. Give me something that will keep me busy all the time."

Their eyes met, and her expressive mouth broke into a sad and wistful smile.

tender mouth, I begin to question some of my pet theories—"

"Then you must not lie there any longer," said Jean, as she arranged the fire, "you shall get up to-morrow."

"Impossible!" and the sunken eyes flashed dangerously. "Don't you know I am 'invalide pour toujours'?" Intend to pose as a second Simon Stylites without his pillar. "So sad it is to see, a fair young life thus wrecked, and hopelessly," and a hollow laugh rang pitifully through the elegant chamber.

"Then I shall leave at once. I never stay if my patients will not try to improve."

"Bravissimo! I do enjoy your pluck; but, since I cannot spare you, you must stay, if at quadruple your salary."

Jean snapped her fingers contemptuously. "A fig for your silver and gold! So you, too, think it omnipotent. Why, the patient I did the most for never paid me at all, but with pain."

"What a multifarious little monster that is! Always cropping up where least expected—even with you, you demure piece of righteousness. Why is no power strong enough to cast it out?"

"Where would you find its disciplinary substitute? Unbeaten gold is not attractive."

THE LADIES OF THE WHITE HOUSE

From 1789
to 1901

MRS. JOHN ADAMS MRS. MARTHA RANDOLPH

THE WHITE HOUSE AS IT USED TO BE

MRS. JAMES MADISON MRS. JAMES MONROE

CLAD in deep mourning, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt entered the Executive Mansion, September 26, under sadder circumstances than have ever marked the installation of a "Lady of the White House"—although no one forgets how profoundly sorrowful were the times which called for Mrs. Lincoln's successor, nor of how the people grieved when Garfield died. With public buildings everywhere swathed in black, flags all over the Union flying at half-mast, a whole nation bowed in woe, herself as its representative wearing garments of grief, our "First Lady" needed some marks of cheer to greet her entrance into her new home; and one is glad to know that these were not lacking. Her husband met her at the door and led her to the dining-room, where a cozy luncheon was ready. With her came two of the children, Ethel and Kermit, and her housekeeper and her maid from Oyster Bay; so there was much to make her feel at home in her new abode.

MRS. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS

MRS. JULIA C. TYLER

A number of changes are under way in the mansion. The big, canopied bedsteads have been relegated to the attic, and pretty white bedsteads have been placed in the rooms on the south side of the building, which will be occupied by the Roosevelt children. Much furniture from the home at Oyster Bay has been brought to the White House. Mrs. Roosevelt, it is said, will look personally after the ways of her household, superintending her own marketing, and giving much time to the education of her children. Her first instructions to Secretary Cortelyou were for announcement to be made to ladies in official and social circles that, out of respect to the memory of the late President, no calls formal or informal would be expected until after Oct. 15.

There are six children in the Roosevelt family. Alice, Theodore, Kermit, Ethel, Archibald and Quentin. Alice, who is seventeen, is the daughter of Mr. Roosevelt's first wife. The household has always been a very happy one. At Oyster Bay and in the Governor's Mansion at Albany, Mrs. Roosevelt has sought to preserve the simplicity and privacy of the typical, democratic American home. Father and mother were comrades for their children; the little folks were jolly as jolly could be; guests were welcomed with hearty hospitality. Appointments of the house were daintiness and comfort combined. Elaborate entertainments and "swell" dinners with gorgeous decorations were not chronicled of the Roosevelts. They are not rich, and they lived well within their means.

At Oyster Bay, Mrs. Roosevelt was fond of going about in a walking-skirt, and playing with her children. She is brown-eyed, brown-haired and rosy. It is a case of congratulation to all Americans that the beautiful home-life of the McKinley's will be followed by that of another pair of wedded lovers, whose devotion to each other has made marriage the blessed relation it should ever be. Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt are the youngest couple who ever entered the White House; and with their troop of happy children they will doubtless make a merry place of the historic dwelling.

Although, including Mr. Roosevelt, only twenty-six men have been vested with the position of Chief Executive of the United States, not less than thirty ladies have reigned as "Mistress of the White House." They appear on the roll of honor in this order: Mrs. Washington, Mrs. John Adams, Mrs. Martha Jefferson Randolph (daughter of Thomas Jefferson), Mrs. Madison, Mrs. Monroe, Mrs. John Quincy Adams, Mrs. Donelson (niece of General Jackson), Mrs. Abram Van Buren (President Van Buren's daughter-in-law), Mrs. Jane F. Harrison (General Harrison's daughter-in-law), Mrs. John Tyler (President Tyler's first wife), Mrs. Robert Tyler

MRS. ABRAM VAN BUREN

MRS. ROBERT TYLER

Tyler (President Tyler's daughter-in-law), Mrs. Semple (his daughter), Mrs. John Tyler (his second wife), Mrs. James Polk, Mrs. Bliss (Benjamin Taylor's favorite daughter), Mrs. Millard Fillmore, Miss Abigail Fillmore, Mrs. Franklin Pierce, Miss Harriet Lane (Buchanan's niece), Mrs. Abraham Lincoln, Mrs. Martha Patterson (Andrew Johnson's daughter), Mrs. U. S. Four of our Presidents were widowers—Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Martin Van Buren, and Chester A. Arthur.

Martha Jefferson Randolph, "the sweetest woman in Virginia," was so fragile and so fond of the quiet of her home in Albemarle, that she did not use to the fullest her opportunities of reigning in Washington during Jefferson's administration; and Mrs. Madison often supplied her place as her father's hostess. The first child born in the White House was Martha's son, James Madison Randolph. Mrs. Donelson, whom President Jackson always addressed as "My daughter," was the wife of his protegee and confidential adviser, Major Andrew J. Donelson. "Lovely Emily," as she was called, contributed much "to render General Jackson's term such a brilliant epoch in American history." Four children were born to her in the White House. As they grew up around the President, he entered into their games and plays; and some of the prettiest pictures ever presented in the White House were those of the aged hero surrounded by these merry little ones. Such scenes were duplicated sixty years later, when Benjamin Harrison became President and the little McKees ruled in their stead.

mother-in-law's room: "It is a most quiet and comfortable retreat with an air of repose and sanctity about it: for here, mother, with a smile of welcome on her sweet, calm face, is always found seated in her large armchair, tions about all you dear ones, because she knows I want to talk about you."

"The Executive Mansion was a place of much more than usual attraction," reads a paper in President Van Buren's day, "in consequence of the appearance there of the bride of the President's son, who was greatly admired." Another bride, "Miss Betty," as Zachary Taylor's daughter, Mrs. Bliss, was called, was warmly received. Mrs. Taylor would not appear at official functions, so "Miss Betty" was perforce "First Lady." But not for long! In little more than a year after his inauguration, the White House was draped in mourning for the second Chief to lie dead within its walls. The first President for whom the bells of Washington tolled, a month after he took the oath of office, was the "Hero of Tippecanoe." Mrs. Harrison was then making ready to come to him. Both Mrs. Taylor and Mrs. Harrison felt that care and responsibility killed their husbands. Twice has the White House stood swathed in black, while its mistress lay dead within. First, when Mrs. Tyler died; next, when Mrs. Benjamin Harrison "fell asleep in Christ." Mrs. Filmore died at Willard's Hotel. Her daughter, Miss Abigail Filmore, even during her fragile mother's lifetime, had begun to bear the burdens and wear the honors of "First Lady." To Mrs. Filmore, the Executive Mansion owes its first library. The place was almost devoid of books when she went there; influenced by her, Mr. Filmore asked Congress for the necessary appropriation and forthwith a big, pleasant room was furnished with good books, and here Mrs. Filmore surrounded herself with her little home comforts, and Abigail brought her harp, piano, and guitar. Mrs. Franklin Pierce, although an invalid, bore up bravely under the fatigues of her position. She was very pious, and her scruples in regard to keeping the Sabbath, had an influence upon public life. "Each Sunday morning," we are told, by her historian, "of her four

WE ASK YOUR KIND CO-OPERATION

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is starting its subscription season unusually early this year, with a view to giving the very best service possible.

We know our people, and our past experience has taught us that they can be depended upon for all reasonable co-operation in any measure that commends itself to their judgment.

We are endeavoring this year to anticipate some of the usual December rush and distribute it over October and November, in order that the business may be handled by our experienced employees, and shipments made before the congestion of mail and express facilities (incident to the Holiday season) renders the matter of delivery an uncertain quantity.

We are sure you will be glad to aid us in this matter. You will thus not only confer a great favor on the publisher, but will enable him to render you better service than can be expected at a time when 10,000 letters a day and overtaxed transportation facilities jeopardize accuracy and promptness.

Of course, every subscriber understands that any anticipation of the date of renewal does not work to his disadvantage, as the subscription is extended from the date of expiry and not from the date the renewal is received.

FOURTH in the line of Premium Positions is Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary. If there is a volume in the world which should be read intelligently and understandingly, it is the Bible—the Book of books, that Heaven-inspired volume which is the foundation and the corner-stone of our glorious faith. Yet no other volume is so rich in important allusions and references which require intelligent elucidation. Even the illustrious Enoch, when Philip questioned him pointedly, "Understandest thou what thou redest?" was forced to confess: "How can I, except some should guide me?" Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary will be found one of the most helpful aids to the intelligent understanding of the sacred text. This marvellous work contains 811 pages, 440 illustrations, and eight splendid maps. It is bound in two styles, cloth, plain edges, and flexible American levant with red under gold edges. We offer both styles.

For the leather bound and red under gold edge edition together with "The Christian Herald" for one year, send $3.00. For the cloth, plain edge edition and "The Christian Herald" for one year, send $2.00. Of course, we pay full charges in both instances.

FIFTH in order comes the International Teachers' Bible, in large Ing Primer type, with references, maps, and word book, bound in American levant, red under gold edges, thumb-indexed, sent with "The Christian Herald" for one year for only $3.00.

* * *

For the very same Bible in every respect, Divinity Circuit, but without leather lining or thumb index, and "The Christian Herald" for one year, send only $2.00.

* * *

When ordering an International Bible, state whether you wish Revised or Authorized Version. The RED LETTER BIBLE is the Authorized Version only.

OUR GREAT ART PORTFOLIO

WE feel so pleased, so delighted, and so happy over our beautiful Art Portfolio, that we hardly dare trust ourselves to comment upon it lest we overdo it. And yet, saying all the complimentary things we can think of in this connection, we are manifestly conscious of our utter inability to do it even half justice.

Nothing that we have been privileged to offer our subscribers during the past ten years in the line of calendars, etchings, lithographs, etc., can compare in richness, refinement, intrinsic merit, quantity and durability with this revelation of art and beauty, this wealth of pictorial enchantment.

The Art Portfolio contains twelve beautiful, splendidly executed subjects, measuring 9x12 inches each, without margin, and representing the very cream of thousands of the choicest art productions. Some of these pictures have smooth finish, others are egg-shelled or roughened, and all are so carefully packed as to insure undamaged delivery anywhere in the world over.

THE tendency of the times is to read up in all proper directions, and by means of current publications to keep posted as to what is going on in this great world of ours. Hence, many families now require more than one periodical. To meet this demand, Combination Propositions are being submitted by enterprising publishers, which enable subscribers to Enjoy Three or Four Papers at about the Price of Two. "The Christian Herald" can justly lay claim to being the Pioneer in this movement. This year again, as in former years, we have perfected Arrangements with Ten other Publishers, enabling us to offer Combinations which will be found, Financially and otherwise, Far More Attractive than Any Offered Elsewhere.

The Pastors' Combination mentioned below, insures an economy of just one-half; the Sunday School Workers' Combination effects a like economy, and the others afford equally advantageous terms. We are sure that the readers of "The Christian Herald" will appreciate the opportunities here offered, and will send their Subscriptions promptly, direct to us. Address, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. See "Points Worth Knowing," printed below.

AT this time of writing it is impossible to state accurately how many Portfolios can be produced from the original engravings, now in the hands of the art engravers, in time for our holiday requirements, but we shall make every reasonable effort to prove equal to the occasion, so that none of our friends may meet with disappointment.

Delivery of the Art Portfolios will begin November 10th, and they will be sent out in the exact order of the subscriptions received. Under no circumstances will these Art Portfolios be sold for cash, nor will two sets be sent to any one subscriber. It is necessary to enforce this rule, in order that uniform treatment may be accorded to all.

The Art Portfolio will be sent FREE to all who subscribe for "The Christian Herald," whether with or without premium. It is a Free Gift of the publisher to his subscribers, and if it so be that, for the time being or in the years to come, it afford them and their families any measure of real enjoyment, he will feel himself more than repaid.

Denominational Union

THE spirit of combination is in the air. Enormous combinations of capital have taken place. The great trusts are a fact, for good or evil. Antedating them, are the great labor unions, the power of which has made itself felt in all manufacturing communities. But the spirit has not stopped there. It is leavening the churches. At the recent Pan-Methodist Conference in London, a resolution was passed, expressing the confident anticipation that the numerous branches of the Methodist family will see that it is the Divine will to effect an organic union.

Already the Methodist Churches of Australia have united, and now comes the news that in the same land the Presbyterian Churches have found a basis of union. At a great meeting held in Sydney, the moderators of the various General Assemblies met on the same platform and signed a deed of union amid the utmost enthusiasm. Nor did the movement end there. An influential committee was appointed "to devise a scheme for the federation of as many as possible of the Protestant Churches of Australia, with power to confer with the representatives of other Churches, so as to promote closer fellowship and organized co-operation, with a view to the ultimate formation of one grand Church of Australia."

The Australians are evidently a progressive people. They gave us the system of balloting now used in our political elections, and it may be that they are yet to give us the grand religious platform, on which the denominations which are preaching the same Gospel may come together in one strong united church. In any case, the movement will be watched with intense interest and with the best wishes for its success. That there are formidable difficulties in the way must be admitted; but there are none in which principle is vitally affected, and with as strong a disposition to mutual concession as has been manifested, there is ground for hope.

If success is achieved in Australia, the movement will surely spread to other lands. We may even now be witnessing the dawn of that glorious day when our Lord's prayer shall be fulfilled, "That they all may be one, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

One Lesson from the Tragedy

AFTER a brief but dignified trial, during which all the formalities of the law were complied with, Leon Czolgosz, the Anarchist, has been convicted of the murder of President McKinley, and condemned to expiate his crime in the electric chair. Two of the ablest counsel in New York State, men of long experience on the judicial bench, were appointed to conduct his defense. They undertook the ungracious task with natural reluctance; yet nothing was left undone that could be done, honorably and legally, in the prisoner's behalf. The rights of the accused, as well as those of the people, were carefully guarded, and the wheels of justice moved smoothly and without friction. At no time was the trial sensational; although his act had robbed the nation of its best-loved and most honored citizen, the assassin received the same considerate judicial treatment that would have been accorded the most ordinary criminal. It was a spectacle for the whole world to witness this trial, in which passion, or prejudice, or the desire for vengeance were not permitted for a single instant to impede the even and dignified course of justice.

Czolgosz and his hideous crime will leave for the nation a lesson that should not be neglected. In our churches, our schools, our newspapers and everywhere, the truth should be emphasized that idleness leads to vice and crime; that lawless antagonism to constituted authority is the parent of treason and the blackest dishonor; and that when a man abandons control of his desires and passions, he is instantly headed for savagism and every conceivable infamy. It is a significant fact which came out during the investigation of the case, that Czolgosz, nominally a Catholic, is really an infidel. It is almost invariably the case that the disciples of disorder are atheists or infidels. From denying God's authority in the universe, it is an easy step to repudiate all human authority on earth. Infidel and anarchic ideas are imbibed together at the same source. Woe be to the young man or woman who is trained in that diabolic school! It were better they had never been born.

Sound moral training is the surest pledge of good citizenship. No one who contemns divine authority can respect human laws. An impious man is reasonably to be regarded as a "suspicious person," since his impiety is of itself an avowal that he sets authority at defiance, and that the lives, property and reputations of others are unsafe at his hands. He sees with oblique and distorted vision. To him, everything in the social order is wrong and should be uprooted. He regards labor as a curse, and the laborer a slave in the yoke of the oppressor. To his jaundiced imagination, those conditions he does not approve assume the form of gigantic evils; and as he believes in neither law nor authority, he preaches redress by violence.

Czolgosz is a type of this dangerous class—the product of ignorance, impiety, and fanaticism. It is a transplantation from foreign soil, and is in no sense an American product. It has been called "the army of discontent," but it is more than probable that the failures of the discontented would have all been transformed into successes, had they worked as hard as they grumbled. Idle, aimless, without moral helm or compass, they drift about, the associates of disturbers and lawbreakers. Into their hearts, already embittered, are poured satanic suggestions, which take root and flourish there, until, like the fabled upas tree, they overshadow and poison the whole life. Such depraved natures are ripe for iniquity. They become the implacable enemies of society and the State, and their existence is a menace to the entire community.

Legislative action may restrain, but cannot eradicate this evil. Congress may shut the gate against disturbers from abroad, but our schools, our churches and our presses must undertake the larger and far more important work at home, of protecting the youth of our land from this taint by educating them to a higher and purer patriotism. Our children must be taught that which far outweighs in value all their other studies—the difference between right and wrong. If we would influence a nation's destinies, we must begin with the children. They must be taught to have faith in an overruling Providence and to recognize God's hand at the helm. They must be stimulated to a deeper love of our great Republic and a right comprehension of its principles and institutions. Loyalty to the Republic must be inculcated as a cardinal virtue, and with it, obedience to its laws, and respect for those whom the Republic has entrusted with authority. To thus raise the standard of Christian citizenship all over the land is the task of the immediate future.

Better Schools

GOD speed all reformatory movements, school reform included. Let us rejoice at the advance already made. Compare the qualification of teachers now with those who presided over our schoolboy days. It is a wonder that we know anything. We were gadded, and boxed and pulled by the ears, and stood in the corner on one foot, and kept in after school, and given extra lessons to learn. Some of the teachers no doubt were well qualified, but others, I remember, were cross and petulant and impatient and revengeful, and ignorant and boorish. I remember my old teacher used to open the school with prayer, putting one foot over on the chair, and his elbow on his knee, and his hands over his eyes, but his fingers wide open apart to see what went on, and seemed more anxious to note the effect of his prayer in the schoolroom than the effect of his prayer in heaven. Then the schoolhouse was unshaded in summer weather, and was caught between the loose clapboards in the wintry blast. We all drank out of one tin cup, and sat on benches without backs. I have not one pleasant memory of all my school-days except that which is connected with the recess and vacation.

Let us rejoice that the educational opportunities of to-day are so far in advance of what they were in our childhood. Still, the largest room in the world is the room for improvement, and we owe the grand men and women who preside as teachers in our schools better apartments in which to train and develop the young.

Children are sometimes thought to be dull when they are only asphyxiated. An over-crowded schoolroom is a warm invitation to scarlet fever and measles and diphtheria. Money put in schoolhouses is money saved from penitentiaries. The best way to lessen taxes is to pay more money for the intelligence of the people. There is a style of economy which is the worst extravagance. Good schools tend toward empty almshouses. Knowledge lifts. Ignorance depresses. It is no rare thing to find educated scoundrelism, to the vast majority of the criminal classes, the writing of their own names is a difficult enterprise. We society knows more it will behave better. The newspaper column which discusses the school question should be read through by every citizen, patriot and Christian.

Whirlpool of Politics

BLESSED is the man who expects no political ferment. No life on earth is so full of perturbation as the politician's life. More changeable than the wind are the prospects of such an one. Better get an industrious occupation or trade and stick to it. The most illustrious politicians that this country ever saw, all died of broken hearts—Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, William H. Seward.

The vast majority of successful men in politics are accidents. The great lighthouses of American statesmanship merely show others the way into the harbor, while they themselves get no nearer the wharf than Barnegat. Yet how many men doing well in other occupations are hankering after politics as a trade. They gradually absent themselves from their law offices, successful practice, and from the storehouse of probable traffic, and give themselves up to wire-pulling and caucuses and lounging around political headquarters, pick up a few crumbs of political reward, and drop into dissipation, and a life that ought to have brought grandly rounded ends a dead failure. While we are not to have the ship of State manned with a skilful crew, and with those who have integrity and strength to bear the stress, our advice to most people is, keep out of politics.

The Blessing in India

FROM many quarters, evidence has come of a rich spiritual blessing that has followed as a result of the beneficent, life-saving work done in India during the great famine. The latest testimony to the value of the relief work, not merely as a means of securing the perishing ones, but, under Divine providence, of touching the hearts of a vast population, comes from the pen of Bishop Warne, of the M. E. Church. The reverend bishop's letter is as follows:

CALCUTTA, INDIA, Aug. 29, 1901

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: The amount of good that has been done in India is beyond all praise, and my thousands will rise up to call you blessed. I baptize, when in Gujerat, over 1,300 people, the majority of whom were persons who had been rescued by the Fund during the famine, and the whole population favorably disposed toward Christianity because of the way the Christians came forward to relieve them and their distresses during the famine. We will soon have twenty thousand Christians in Gujerat, and we owe much to you, and trust you will be equally blessed by your work for China. God bless you abundantly!

Very affectionately yours, FRANK W. WARNE

This glad message comes to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has had a share in the work of rescue in India, and to all who have helped the Famine Fund in any measure. "Twenty thousand Christians in Gujerat," is a glorious Gospel triumph, which should inspire God's children everywhere with still greater zeal for service. Surely the bread that is cast upon the waters, in those times of darkness and death in India, has been found after many days.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Assassin Condemned

ONLY one end to the trial of Czolgosz was possible, after his sanity was clearly proved. In fact, he pleaded guilty, though the plea was not accepted. It was important that the forms of law should be observed, especially in the case of a man whose controlling principle was opposition to all law. He was, therefore, arraigned like other criminals, in the ordinary way, and all the rights and privileges of prisoners on trial were accorded to him. Justice Truman C. White, of the Supreme Court, who presided, assigned as his counsel ex-Justice Loran L. Lewis, and ex-Justice Robert C. Titus, in order that anything that could be advanced in the prisoner's defense, or anything that could be urged in mitigation of punishment might be presented with ability and force. There was, however, no plea possible, and after the case had been formally proved the jury returned the only verdict that could be rendered. The prisoner maintained an impassive demeanor throughout the trial, and made no attempt, such as was made by Guiteau, the murderer of Garfield, to justify his act. He insisted, when brought up for sentence, that he had no accomplices, that he alone was responsible, and that no one paid him or lured him to commit the horrible crime, and that until two days before committing it he had not thought of murder. Having heard the statement, Justice White sentenced the prisoner to die by electrocution, at some time during the week beginning October 28. It is stated that since his sentence, Czolgosz has expressed penitence and sincere regret for what he did. His removal to Auburn, where the execution will take place, was followed by a complete collapse. He appeared to realize, on his arrival, the doom that awaited him. His strength of body and mind deserted him and he had to be carried to his cell, where he could be heard howling and shaking in abject terror. It is only that the speakers and writers who could arouse so weak a creature to do so wicked a deed, cannot be punished for the crime that was more theirs than his. Though such people may escape punishment in this world, they are woe that they cannot evade the judgment of God, who knows their guilt.

The Lord knoweth how to keep the ungodly unto the day of judgment, chiefly them that walk after the flesh and despise government, rising in matters whereof they are ignorant, who shall in their destruction ingloriously be destroyed. (II. Peter 2: 2, R. V.)

Rescued from the Rapids

A respondent girl attempted to commit suicide a few days ago at Niagara Falls. She was seen passing down Falls street on the State Reservation just after sunset. There was nothing in her demeanor to indicate that she was doing more than enjoying a quiet walk on the pleasant evening; but when she reached the edge of the water at the upper rapids her manner changed. She took off her hat and jacket and leaped into the current, which at that point is frightfully swift. In a moment she was being swept toward the base of the American falls, not over five hundred feet away. In floating down stream the current threw her toward shore and a reservation policeman saw her. Leaping out over the river as far as he could, he grabbed her clothing, and in another minute he pulled her from the river and saved her from death. A minute later it would have been impossible to draw her out of the swift stream. So much depends on help being extended at an early stage on the way to destruction. How many are in the rapids of sin, which lead to eternal death, who might be saved if an arm were stretched out to help them at the beginning of their downward course.

Let him know, that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his ways, shall save a soul from death (James 5: 20).

Asylum Burned

There was a most distressing scene at the Norfolk Asylum for the Insane in Nebraska on the night of September 23. More than three hundred patients and for attendants were in the building. The night watchman in going his rounds, noticed a smell of burning, but could not find any sign of fire. However, he gave the alarm, and it was then found, that owing to a defect in a tunnel, through which run the heating pipes and the electric lighting wires, a fire had broken out which was soon beyond control. The town is three miles away, and the supply of water was soon exhausted. Efforts were made to get the patients out, but it was a work of great difficulty. Many were unwilling to leave, and it was difficult to compel them. Some were carried down blazing stairways, and others down shaky ladders. Others, however, resisted, and two of them fought desperately the attendants who were trying to save their lives. Two, who were rescued by a brave attendant, who brought them out at the risk of his life, ran back again into the flames, and soon perished. The poor creatures were, of course, demented. Otherwise, being once saved from the flames, they would never have gone back. Yet there are many who have been rescued from lives of sin, who, with the full use of all their faculties, have voluntarily gone back to their own destruction.

If after they have escaped the pollutions of the world, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning (II. Peter 2: 20).

An Eccentric Millionaire

New England journals publish a strange story of a family which has lived in Middleborough, Mass., for eighty years past, but became extinct by the death of the last survivor last week. The founder of the family built a store there when there seemed little prospect of business, but he made a large fortune. He left it to be equally divided among his eleven children. Of these only three married, and none of them left descendants. Each left his or her share, largely increased, to the lowed to kiss and hug their diseased relatives. Now a stockade has been erected, which keeps the visitors from contact, while being near enough to converse. This, and the refusal to allow a healthy wife to accompany her leper husband to Molokai, or vice versa, have prevented the propagation of the disease, and, it is believed, will ultimately bring it to a very small compass. Both the sufferers and their friends protest against the beneficent measures which prevent contact, but the facts prove that the measures are wise. The same principle of separation should be self-applied by those who are anxious to escape the malady of sin, of which leprosy is a type.

Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing (II. Cor. 6: 17).

A Moving Mountain

One of the principal mines of Butte, Mont., was closed on Sept. 23, on account of alarming displacements attributed to a movement of the mountain. It has been noticed for some time past that the shafts were changing their shape and the machinery was working unevenly. An examination by experts was made, which led to the discovery that there had been a slide of the earth to the extent of seven inches. This had broken and pushed aside the foundation of the hoisting engine, which had been laid at a cost of forty thousand dollars. The mine was closed at once, throwing five hundred men out of work. It is generally believed that the movement of the earth is due to the mining excavations, but many mining engineers and geologists assert that the movement of the Anaconda

Hill is similar to the movements that have caused displacements in different parts of the city of Butte for a number of years. They declare that it is caused by a gradual and continuous sliding motion of the entire mountain range about Butte. An old mining man is authority for the statement that, in his recollection the top of Anaconda Hill has moved no less than seven feet to the south and west. Mountains have often been referred to as a figure of permanence and stability, but it appears that the figure is faulty, for even the mountains may move. In the face of this fact, which the poor miners in Montana are realizing to their cost, the prediction of the natural phenomena of the last days should no longer be derided:

The heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places (Rev. 6: 14).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. Dr. Spencer, the Canadian Evangelist, is laboring with the First Baptist Church, Winnipeg, Manitoba, during September and October, and having good congregations. He reports the growth of Christian work in Canada's great West as gratifying.

Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, O., commences its term with an increased number of students. The enrollment for the year will reach nearly 1,500. They have had the advantage of listening to Prof. Caspar R. Gregory, one of the greatest authorities on New Testament manuscripts.

The Rev. Hugh Black, after his four weeks of preaching at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, in New York, is spending a month in getting acquainted with the country. He has gone to Washington first, but plans to visit Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities, and hopes to reach Chicago.

European journals chronicle a notable lawsuit just concluded, in which 105 lawyers were employed. As usual, it was a dispute about a will. The testator, a merchant of Milan, left an estate valued at three million dollars. At the settlement, it was found that the costs of the lawsuit had absorbed two millions.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been holding successful meetings at Denison, Tex. He is now at Paris, Tex., where nine churches are uniting in the services. On October 16 he goes to Dallas to begin a great movement in which twenty churches of various denominations are uniting. They are erecting a great tabernacle for the meetings, that will hold five thousand persons.

Miss S. D. Doremus, Secretary of the Woman's Union Missionary Society, has sailed on a tour of the Society's mission stations in India, China and Japan. The society was the first to send an American woman to engage in zenana work in India, the first to establish a woman's hospital in Shanghai, China, and the first to open a school for girls in Yokohama, Japan. It has done a noble work in all these lands, and its representatives will be encouraged by a visit from the Secretary.

The American Board of Foreign Missions has instructed its agent at Constantinople to pay the ransom demanded by the brigands who carried off Miss Stone, one of their missionaries. It is expected that the Board will be reimbursed through the efforts of the State Department, but in the meantime it is important to effect Miss Stone's release from captivity. It appears that Mrs. Tsilka, the wife of an Albanian preacher, was carried off at the same time. There were eighteen persons in the party in all, but the others escaped with the loss of their watches and money. The brigands are believed to be Bulgarians, not Turks.

others, until the youngest, the last survivor, was a very wealthy man. He carried on the original business established by his father and lived alone, having many acquaintances but no friends. He had a large library, and he was wont to say that his business and his books were sufficient for all his needs. When near the close of his life, a neighbor, concerned for his spiritual welfare, urged him to make his peace with God; he said it had never been his habit to deal with middlemen, and he expected to treat with God when he came into his presence. The remark, if piquant, was neither wise nor courteous. His relations with God were not like his relations with the manufacturers from whom he purchased his goods. He might have learned that fact from the ministers to whom he contemptuously referred as "middlemen," and learned, too, that without a Mediator, he could not even enter his presence.

No man cometh unto the Father, but by me (John 14: 6).

Leprosy Decreasing

Recent advices from Honolulu show that leprosy is being eradicated in the Hawaiian Islands. The number of lepers sent to Molokai during this year is exactly one-half of those sent last year and only one-fifth of those sent to the settlement in 1899. There are now nine hundred lepers there, while five years ago there were thirteen hundred. Unhappily, this is not due to any remedy that has been found for the disease, but to the fact that the lepers die, and not as many people are being infected. The stringency of the new regulations adopted since the Islands were annexed to the United States are, to a large extent, the cause of the improvement. Formerly, visitors were freely admitted, and al-

JOSEPH EXALTED

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR OCTOBER 20 GENESIS 41: 38-49
GOLDEN TEXT: "THEM THAT HONOR ME I WILL HONOR." 1 SAM. 2: 30

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

I do not ask my cross to understand,
My way to see;
Better in darkness just to feel thy hand
And follow thee.
Joy is like restless day; but peace Divine
Like quiet night;
Lead me, O Lord, till perfect day shall shine
Through peace to light.
—ADELAIDE PROCTOR.

The Lesson Story

"WHAT'S in a dream?" Our dreams seldom mean more than indigestion. But when there was no Bible, God spoke to men in dreams. He promised Joseph, in those boyhood dreams about the moon and stars bowing to the sun, and the sheaf to which other sheaves courtesied, the very greatness that is described in to-day's lesson. The butler's dream, which Joseph interpreted, was a middle step to the king's dream, which begins this lesson.

More wonderful than the unfolding of the fairy tent, taken from a magic nut, which spread and spread until it covered a king's whole army, were the events which came out of the two dreams of the great Pharaoh of Egypt. Foolish dreams they seem, as we read them over, and yet out of them came release from prison of a man who shortly was made a ruler next to the king himself. Out of the dreams came also storehouses which covered the land of Egypt; and out of the dreams came plenty for thousands of hungry people.

These were the dreams: Pharaoh seemed to see seven fat cows coming up out of the Nile river, and they fed in the meadow. His dream went on, and he saw seven lean cows come up out of the river. They did not eat grass, but instead, they ate up the seven fat cows! Pharaoh dreamed again, and saw seven good heads of wheat—called in the Bible "ears of corn"—growing on one stalk; and then he saw seven thin heads of wheat, and the thin ones ate up the seven full ones. "What do my dreams mean?" demanded Pharaoh of the wisest men in his kingdom; but they could not tell him. Then the king's butler remembered the promise he had forgotten for two years. He spoke to the king about Joseph in prison, how he had told him the meaning of his dream, and also the dream of the baker. Pharaoh sent at once for Joseph. He came as soon as he had shaved himself and put off his prison clothes.

Joseph was then a young man, only about thirty years old. Already the wonderful events foretold in Joseph's boyhood dreams are unfolding. When Pharaoh told Joseph that he had sent for him that he might learn the meaning of his dreams, Joseph modestly said, "It is not in me," but full of faith in his God, he added, "God shall give Pharaoh an answer." And Joseph told Pharaoh just what God revealed to him, that the seven fat cows and the seven full heads of wheat meant seven years of plenty in Egypt; and the seven lean cows and the seven thin heads of wheat, seven years of famine, which would eat up all the grain raised in the plentiful years. God made Joseph wise to suggest to Pharaoh that much of the corn—whatever the people did not need—during the seven years of plenty, should be gathered into great barns, so that the people might have food during the years of famine.

Pharaoh was so well pleased with Joseph that he said: "Forasmuch as God hath showed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art. Thou shalt be over my house." And he put his gold ring on Joseph's finger—his seal ring—which gave him power to do whatever he should please in the name of the king. And he had garments of white linen, like the king's own, put upon him; and a gold chain was placed around Joseph's neck as a sign of power, and Pharaoh told him he should ride in the chariot next his own, and he commanded all of the people to bow down to him as they did to the king himself. Surely a more wonderful unfolding than that of a fairy tent, and this a real one! The best of it all was, that Joseph set immediately to do the work for which he had been placed in such a high position, to arrange for the storing of the grain to be used during the years of famine. How busy he must have been during those seven years of plenty! How often he must have used the seal ring of Pharaoh as he planned for the building of the storehouses in every part of the land! One less "wise and discreet" than Joseph would have his head turned by his sudden elevation; but honors were to him but opportunities to be a blessing to others.

Illustration and Application

Whoever believes the Bible must believe that God spoke to men in dreams and visions, when there was no Bible, or only an incomplete one. Such visions were the miracles of the night. Like other miracles they are no longer needed, now that we have the greatest miracles of all ever before us, namely: the Bible, and the living Word, Jesus Christ, to whom it points us; and our ever-present guide, the Holy Spirit (I. Cor. 2: 10). The theory that other revelations are to be expected, as if the Bible was not a complete rule of faith and practice, opens the way for such false prophets as those which Mohammedans, Mormons and Dowietes and several other sects accept as of inspired authority, whose visions are regarded as new chapters of divine revelation. They do not supplement the finished Bible, but are to be tested by it. "If they speak not according to this Word, there is no light in them."

"IT IS NOT IN ME: GOD SHALL GIVE PHARAOH AN ANSWER OF PEACE"

But in rejecting supernatural claims for dreams of our time, let us not neglect their natural significance. Telling dreams at breakfast, and attaching to them some superstitious meaning, is an offence against good sense and good taste. But it would be good sense to remember dreams silently at table as warnings against dream-provoking sins of diet. Perfect sleep is dreamless, and we should wish a guest such sleep rather than even "pleasant dreams." Perfect darkness and perfect silence conduce to such perfect sleep.

How like the change from night to day was Joseph's call from prison to palace, from slavery to sovereignty! Perhaps there had come to him some night in prison, as to John the Baptist, a time of doubt, when his boyhood dream of sun and moon and stars seemed a mockery, and he could have adopted Holland's "Song of Despair:"

The moon is gone, and the stars are dead,
God has forgotten the world.

But Faith replied in antiphonal chant:

Day will return with a fresher boon,
God will remember the world

"It is not so much brilliancy of intellect and versatility of resource, as persistency of effort and constancy of purpose that give success. When we see a young man whom labor cannot weary, whom drudgery cannot disgust or dishearten, who meets reverses with an erect, unflinching bearing, we know that he will win. There is no keeping him down," so writes the editor of Success.

Out of the long Arctic night of thirteen years, into which his young soul entered when he was cast by his brothers into the pit, he emerged at last into the promised sunrise of his early vision. For every child of God the night of sorrow and trial shall pass into the sunburst of the dawn—here or there.

Upon the sadness of the sea
The sunset broods regretfully;
From the far, lonely spaces slow
Withdraws the wistful afterglow.

So out of life the splendor dies,
So darken all the happy skies,
So gathers twilight, cold and stern;
But overhead the planets burn.

And up the East another day
Shall chase the bitter dawn away.
What though our eyes with tears be wet
The sunrise never failed us yet.

The blush of dawn may yet restore
Our light and hope and joy once more
Sad soul, take comfort, nor forget
That sunrise never failed us yet.

—CELIA THAX

When the day came to Joseph, how easy it was to see that his long night of slavery had been an evening school of preparation to rule! Ruling Potiphar's household and ruling the prison, though he was a slave, had prepared him to rule Egypt. From Potiphar, and later from his prison, the chief butler and chief baker, he had learned the innermost secrets of government. So our darkest hours are schooling us for greater usefulness. The most beautiful patterns of Brussels lace are spun in a darkened room, the only light being admitted through a very small window directly upon the pattern. So life seems all dark and mysterious, save only one ray of light falling on the next step in our own path of duty. That is a day clear, and that is enough.

Joseph had God's word for it that he was to be as the Sun. Cast into prison on a false charge, it might have seemed to one a useless faith that evil had been done. But the word of God is not bound, not even the word he has sent to a boy, when as yet the Bible was not written, much less can chains, or prison, or fires destroy the Bible. Just as Dr. Johnson had finished translating the New Testament into Burmese, he was cast into prison. His wife took the precious manuscript and buried it in the ground. But if left there it would soon decay; while to reveal its existence to its foes would surely lead to destruction. So it was arranged that she put it within a roll of cotton, and bring it to him in the form of a pillow, so hard and poor that even the keeper of the prison did not covet it. Some time after he was hurried off to another prison, leaving everything behind him, and his old pillow was thrown into the prison yard, to be trodden under foot as worthless cotton; but after a few hours one of the native Christians discovered the roll, and took it home. There, long afterwards, the manuscript was found with the cotton, complete and uninjured. Not Bible saints alone, but the Bible itself God has often delivered from peril. "The word of our God abideth forever."

After all, the great lesson in this passage is that daily faithfulness in lowly tasks is the straight road to true success.

"Faithful Over a Few Things, Ruler Over Many"

Let boys and girls in lowly places think more of faithfulness and less of position. Better be a big man more than fill a small place than a small man rattling around in a large place. Make yourself as big as possible on the inside. Make yourself greater than your position as the best way to get out of it into a larger one. If the promotion does not come in his world, be sure it will in the next. Many a Great-heart has been called great in the kingdom of heaven, has been greatly useful in a small place all his life. As Pharaoh turned to counsel and help to a Christian slave and prisoner, rising to the wisdom that God gives, so many of the high have turned to the lowly who were richer than they in this life.

Professor Park, of Andover, one of America's greatest theologians, used to say that he had learned more of spiritual things of an old woman in an almshouse than from anybody else. Another Christian professor said that he owed very much spiritually to a servant in his home. "I have learned more from her," he said, "than from any of my distinguished colleagues upon whose preaching I am delighted to wait." "Can we find such a one as this, a man in whom the spirit of God is?" said even heathen Pharaoh, when confronted with the great problem of famine. Even for political position in critical times those who are truly men of God are desired. Great examples were our own Washington and Lincoln.

Joseph for thirteen years pulled the oars of duty with his back to the future, but God was steering all the while, and every stroke in the darkness brought him nearer to the light. Joseph before the king was calm, because he knew he was the protected ambassador of a greater King. Latimer, while preaching one day before Henry VIII., stood up in the pulpit, and seeing the king, addressed himself in a kind of colloquy, thus: "Latimer, Latimer, Latimer, take care of what you say, for the great King Henry VIII. is here." The king paused, and proceeded: "Latimer, Latimer, Latimer, take care what you say, for the great King of kings is here."

HONORING THE GOVERNOR

ON AUTUMN DAYS

by
Margaret E. Sangster

The Fire on the Hearth

WISH I could persuade every woman who can manage it, to have, in these early days of the fall, an open fire. A bit of fire on the hearth, that one can see, and poke, and heap wood on, or stir to a leaping blaze, if it be made of soft coal, is a ceaseless delight, and carries with it a great deal of cheer. One comes in, cold and shivering in a damp, raw afternoon, when the east wind strikes with a razor-like that at the marrow of the spine, and no hot air rising from a register or diffused from a steam radiator is so comfortable as the fire that one can look at, and cuddle down beside, and tuck one's toes in front of its genial blaze. An open fire invites to sociability, if a dear friend share it with you, and is as excellent a setting for confidences as ever was starlight or moonbeam. Also, it is very ornamental, and furnishes a shabby room so that it looks like a palatial apartment, suggesting, as always does, fullness and plenty, and all things bright and fair.

We are apt to light our furnaces too early in the season. An occasional show day in our climate does not mean winter by any means, and we may have a lot of Indian summer seasons before snow flies. The longer we can delay the heating of our houses against winter's rigors, the better for our health and for the roses in our children's cheeks.

Softwood, crystallized with the salt of the sea, makes a fire of marvellous mystery and charm. Pine knots are very satisfactory, mingled with harder woods, birch, chestnut, hickory, and coal. American cannel coal is cheaper than English, and serves the same purpose; while, for steady service, a good grade of anthracite coal in a grate is not to be despised. The gas log has been made to resemble a wood fire so exactly that it can deceive the very elect, until they notice the absence of ashes, and it has the advantage of being lighted with a match, extinguished at discretion, and not making the least litter or dust. Choose what you like, my lady, but have an open fire.

Abdyl of Tender Love

There are few households in which the tenderness of our late President for his invalid wife, has not been spoken of with real appreciation since his death. An equal devotion is, no doubt, shown by many husbands to many wives, but it was given to Mr. McKinley his high place to show the splendid chivalric gentleness to all the world. Truly, he wore the white flower of blameless life in all men's eyes, and his country rejoices in the memory of a purity, simplicity and fidelity to a life home ideal, as much as in his qualities of courage and statesmanship. Not a long time shall we cease to mourn for William McKinley, nor ever cease to give God thanks for his illustrious career.

We are apt to feel and express more compassion when youthful lovers are separated by death, than we do when the parting comes after a lifetime of mutual love. Yet, in a true wedlock, every year adds to the union of the two hearts, and the which is more keenly felt by the long-married than by the who have been together but a little while. When there has been the dependence of the weak upon the strong, the loss is, perhaps, more vitally felt, more insupportable than in other conditions.

We never fail to thank God for the beautiful and happy home life of this land of ours. As the autumnal dusk closes in, we like to catch glimpses of homecomings, husbands running up the steps to be greeted by their wives, children running to the door to meet the fathers, wafts of laughter and fun flashing out into the darkness from the lighted houses upon the cold streets. In the country neighborhood you walk under the shadowy village trees, and here and there gleam forth the friendly lamps of home, the camp fires of love.

When earthly days are over, the lights of home will rise, Star-like to give us welcome, the lamps of Paradise, In that sweet heaven that waits us beyond these changeful skies.

"The Great White Father"

At Mr. McKinley's funeral nothing was more touching than the grief of the Indians, who, braves and squaws, formed part of the long procession that viewed his remains in Buffalo. "May the great white father

FIDO ON GUARD

Mother and baby may safely sleep; Fido, the steadfast, his watch will keep sleep in peace" was the pathetic inscription, in the Sioux language, on the wreath the red men brought.

Indians of our Western forests, Chinese, Italians, Bohemians, people of all nationalities, wept for the great white father. "We are heart-sick that he is gone," said the wife of a Russian Jew in Norfolk street, New York, as she talked to a Settlement visitor. And it is indeed because a father is gone, that the September of 1901 will be remembered with a great pang of grief.

FORGIVE US OUR DEBTS

We are so sinful, Lord, so oft we fall,
And thou forgivest in thy mercy great.
May we, too, pardon, since our errors call
For thy strange patience with our low estate.

The False Word

HOW helpless we are in the presence of the false word. Among Christian nations the lie is regarded as the sign of the most degraded moral character. A person whose word cannot be trusted implicitly is looked upon with aversion and contempt. Quite the opposite condition prevails in heathen lands, especially, perhaps, in India, where the cleverness of the liar is commended, and the subtlety of the Oriental mind is lent to the subterfuges and evasions of deceit.

When one discerns in a child a tendency to slyness and intrigue, or a disposition to have recourse to the false word, it is wise to sit down and think what has been amiss in the training. Has there been harshness, which has frightened the timid nature? Has there been a wrong example, in either parent, in recounting with approval, successful tricks and practices not altogether sincere? Have promises and threats been made and broken? Is there somewhere in the child's ancestry anything to account for the lapse into deceit? As we would deal with a physical taint or deformity, doing our very best to cure it, so should we endeavor to cultivate truth and eradicate falsehood in the growing youth.

False words imply falseness of heart. One may act as well as utter a lie. Or, one may deliberately keep silence, and leave a mistaken impression or an error of statement uncorrected. Lying is incompatible with Christian character.

THE RAINY DAY

LITTLE slanting silver drops
Falling into brook and copse;
Little drops that one by one
Into springs and rivers run,
Soaking into thirsty ground,
Bathing meadow, knoll and mound;
Washing all the faded leaves,
Drenching pastures, shorn of sheaves.

Little drops that downward drift
From the plenteous clouds a-rift,
What a rainy day ye make Hither as your way ye take,
Blessings on you, falling fast,
Blessings on you, whirling past,
Silver slanting drops of rain,
Dashing hard against the pane.

The Cigarette Habit

I passed a group of well-dressed little fellows the other day, boys between eleven and thirteen, every one of whom was puffing away at a cigarette. Probably their parents were not aware of the habit, though it would seem that any wide-awake mother would know by very evident traces, whether her little son smoked or not? Do not mothers kiss their boys in these days? Do they never look into the miscellaneous contents of Jack's and Jimmy's pockets? Are the boys never in the house long enough for their mothers and fathers to cultivate an acquaintance with them? If my boy must smoke a cigarette, I'd rather have him do it openly than furtively; rather have him sit on the front porch and smoke, than skulk behind the back fence. But I think boys should be taught the peril and folly of this indulgence, shown how it saps their strength and destroys their athletic powers. Several years ago, the students in a famous Western high school were so often and so ignominiously defeated in baseball contests with other schools, that the faculty looked into the matter. They found out that the boys were beaten because, in skill and endurance and physical condition, their percentage was away below their opponents; they were cigarette smokers, and some of them were so confirmed in the vice as to be little cigarette fiends. No boy will ever be a really fine athlete, football, baseball, or basket-ball player, runner, jumper, or gymnast, who weakens his heart and poisons his blood by cigarette smoking. Fathers might set their lads a good example by non-smoking.

MAKING SUNSHINE IN MANY LANDS

If I can stop one heart from breaking
I shall not live in vain;
If I can ease one life the aching,
Or cool one pain,
Or help one fainting robin
Into his nest again,
I shall not live in vain.

EMILY DICKINSON.

SUCH has been the sentiment of hundreds of letters that have come in, relative to Sunshine work, since the last Sunshine article appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. While it is evident that many of the writers have been in need of good cheer and encouragement, their letters were full of the desire to "ease some life of the aching, or cool one pain."

Branches are forming rapidly. The Escondido Sunshine Branch of California has sent in a long report. Mrs. P. J. Grunhap Fox, Honorary President and founder of this branch, has succeeded in starting a society of eighty members, and sends in a full list of names and addresses. She writes:

I do hope so much that this branch may prove a blessing to this community. You know we are told that it is more blessed to give than to receive. I do not think that all blessings end with receiving. Please do not judge that I am trying to shirk my duty by not taking the presidency of the branch. I will do everything in my power to assist in the work; am proud of the noble society, and feel thankful that the thought originated in the dear old State to which I belong.

This society has taken as its branch motto: Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good work and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

Mrs. A. W. Wohlford has been elected

MISS FROST AND HER SUNSHINE INDIAN GIRLS

President Miss Ida Oaks, Vice-President; Miss Belle Nulton, Secretary; Mrs. Genevive Thomas, Treasurer.

If you wish to form a Christian Herald Sunshine Branch, send to Miss Susan Parsons, President, Room 92, Bible House, New York, for the necessary instructions. You will be furnished with an enrollment blank, constitution and by-laws, etc. All questions will be gladly answered. Enclose five cents for a constitution, and two cents for a reply.

The badges are very pretty indeed; nickel stick-pins, five cents; clasp, ten cents.

Just Think of a Smile

Would you like to know where the smiles are all hid?

At once ask your heart, then, I pray:
For 'tis there they are kept. Now, do as I bid,
Don't longer this duty delay.
Just think of a smile, and again and again
Others will follow apace:
And not only children, but women and men
Will note that there's joy in your face.
Think only of pleasant and beautiful things;
Serenity will then be your mind.
And don't you forget that cheerfulness brings
The brightest of smiles to mankind.

It has been said that once a great personage was asked which he would rather have, good reading matter, or the gold and jewels of India. His reply was, that with the gold and jewels alone he could not be happy, and from his books he could not be parted. Here is a little girl in Hutchinson, Ore., who writes:

We moved down here from Iowa two years ago, and always have had nine months' school every year. This season we have had only four months. The school we belong to now is seven miles from our home. I would like books to read, but we cannot afford to buy any. Do the members pass things on? If so will some one pass on Elsie Dinsmore's book called, Elsie's Holidays at Rose-lands. Your little friend, IRENE KINGOLE.

Has any member this book or any other to send to the little girl so far out of reach of civilization, and so anxious to secure good reading matter?

On account of ill health, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver E. Brower, both Sunshine members, have moved to a little farm at Quaker Farm, Conn.

Mrs. Brower pays her Sunshine dues by taking her neighbors out driving in her buggy. Reading matter is especially scarce, and will our friend in Lovettsville, Va., pass on her books to this family.

Remember there are no dues to the organization. Here are some other ways of paying Sunshine dues:

Mrs. J. C. Thayer, a gentlewoman, has been an invalid for several years and finds herself just a little bit lonesome at times. Her address is, Arcade, N. Y. Will Mrs. Sarah S. McElree, of South Carolina, please send an occasional ray? Good magazines would be appreciated by Mrs. L. M. Prior, of Underhill, Vt. She is a partial shut-in. Miss Elsie Waggon, of Harmony, Me., is an invalid and wishes to correspond with some Sunshine member. Miss Mary E. F. Brett, of 48 Cottage st., Cambridge, Mass., spreads good cheer by helping in the Chinese Sunday School work in Boston every Sunday. Miss Brett has also offered to write letters to shut-ins. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which Miss Lena Stevenson so kindly offered to pass on, will be appreciated by Miss Susan E. Rice, of Falling Springs, Pa., care of Mrs. Bowers. Bound books will be thankfully received by Mrs. Emily Verdery Battey, President of Robinson Springs Sunshine Branch, Robinson Springs, Ala., for her circulating library.

At Evans, Col., there lives an old man, the first member of the International Sunshine Society. He does much good work in the Sunday Schools and prisons, as well as through many other channels. All kinds of religious papers can be utilized. Address "Uncle Dan" Westover, President of the Evans, Colorado, Sunshine branch.

Mrs. J. H. Geffken, of Brimfield, Mass., has been confined to her bed for many weeks, and would like good cheer in the shape of cheery letters, and Mrs. S. Brown, of Fairhaven, Vt., Box 261, would also appreciate an occasional sunshine ray.

There is much sorrow in the home of Mrs. H. F. Lewis. Recently her beloved son passed away. Will someone kindly remember her now and then. Her address is Newell, Iowa.

Don't Worry

Why shadow the beauty of sea or of land
With a doubt or a fear?
God holds all the swift-rolling worlds in his hand,
And sees what no man can as yet understand,
That out of life here,
With its smile and its tear,
Comes forth into light, from Eternity planned,
The soul of good cheer.

Don't worry—
The end shall appear.

—ELIZABETH PORTER GOULD,
Boston, Mass. A Sunshine Member.

One of the most interesting Sunshine branches is that of the Blackfoot Indians, Miss Emelia J. Frost, President. The little Indian girls and their mammas have found new interest in life since they belong to a society, pay dues and wear badges. If anyone wants to fill their hearts with special delight, send them a box of pretty things. Address, Miss Emelia J. Frost, President Blackfoot Sunshine branch, Blackfoot, Idaho (Indian Reservation).

The Tottori Sunshine branch, Mrs. Fanny Borden Bartlett, President, is greatly interested in what the little American children are doing. Mrs. Bartlett has forty members, and each one strives daily to do one kind act for Sunshine. Little Mottie's report for one day was that she "did not pull Mittie's hair."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

M. T. New Baltimore, writes:

My life has been very dark and sad for the past six years; indeed there seemed to be no bright side; but I determined to go to Jesus with my troubles, and ask him to change my heart so that I would see the bright side of life. He has heard and answered my prayer, and I am happier than I have ever been. Since I accepted him he has indeed been my Saviour from sorrow.

S. S. R., Leaksville, N. C., writes:

New Year's morning I began with renewed faith to ask God to convict and convert a dear loved one, and to send him home. He has been absent twelve years. We had heard nothing from him during the time. I asked God to convict while I was praying. In June my dear one wrote home, saying he had bowed in prayer to God New Year's Day for the first time in his life. He had asked God to help him to a new and better life, and God had answered his petition. The next day another letter came, telling us where he is, and saying that he is coming home.

B., Pittsburg, Pa., writes:

A month ago we were much troubled about a very dear boy. I asked God to help us if it were his will. I felt sure that my prayer would be answered, and in less than a week God granted my petition.

years' stay in the White House, she would request, in her gentle, conciliatory way, all the attaches of the mansion to go to church. Mrs. Andrew Johnson was another invalid wife of a President; her mantle fell upon her daughter, Martha Patterson. Louisa Adams, the talented and accomplished wife of our fifth President, lost her health soon after her entrance to the White House. It was during her reign that Lafayette was the Nation's guest, spending several weeks of his stay in America in the Mansion. It was during Mrs. Polk's occupancy that dancing was discontinued at White House functions. It was never resumed. Our first lady of the White House never lived in the building which now bears that name (its cornerstone was not laid till 1792), bestowed upon it in honor of her early home, the "White House," where the "engagement of Martha Custis and General Washington took place." The first occupant of our Executive Mansion was Abigail Adams. She was one of the strongest, ablest, wholesomest of women, and though she was in the Mansion less than six months, her impression abides there to this day. But of all the women who ever lived in the White House, Dolly Madison, perhaps, left most indelible the stamp of her character upon it. During her reign, people went there not only because it was the President's house, but because it was socially the most delightful place in the world. She was merry, intellectual and generous.

Most ranking with Dolly Madison are Mrs. Cleveland, Harriet Lane, President Buchanan's niece, may be regarded as one of the most brilliant and popular women who ever presided over the White House. Her uncle was a bachelor. Many of our "First Ladies" have been "Lady Butifuls" to the poor. Piety, too, has been their marked characteristic.

It will be seen that the purple of our Republic is not always a light burden to the women who must wear it. The hearts of the people go out to Mrs. Roosevelt in earnest sympathy and with sincere hope that she may find more roses than many others have found in the pathway of public service. MYRTA L. AVARY.

Attacked at McKinley's Tomb

A mysterious and unexplained attack on the guard at President McKinley's tomb, Westlawn Cemetery, Canton, O., took place on Sunday night, Sept. 29. To men, one of them masked, crept up to the sentinel in the darkness. The latter challenged one of the men twice, and then made ready to fire, when his rifle was knocked upward by the second intruder. At the same instant, the guard was struck on the head by some blunt instrument, his uniform was slashed, as though by a knife, and he was bodily hied into a gulley near the vault. The assailants escaped. It is believed that the purpose was to blow up the vault with see explosive. A strong guard was put out.

A Brilliant Editor Dead

News of the death of Dr. William C. Gray, editor of the Interior, has caused sincere sorrow in all Presbyterian circles. Dr. Gray had a strong, manly personality, which inspired respect even in those who differed with him, while it won the loving reverence of his friends. Every one knew that the intrepid editor had strong convictions, and that his views on topics secular and religious were entitled to profound respect. His death removes a man of high ability and worth, and leaves the world and the church poorer by his loss.

He was seventy-one years of age, and had been editor of the journal with which his name was so closely identified, for thirty years. He was a native of Ohio, the grandson of a soldier who fought in the Revolutionary war. His early intention was to be a lawyer, and he was admitted to the bar in 1852. Already he had made his mark in journalism in the Miami Democrat, and in the following year he established the Tribune, of Tiffin, O. In 1863 he became editor of the American, of Newark, O., in which position he remained until he assumed charge of the Interior in 1871. His health had failed early in this year, and an operation it was necessary for him to undergo recently caused him further shock from which he could not rally. His life of brilliant and useful service in this world closed on September 29.

A BAD BARGAIN

Esau's Readiness to Sacrifice the Future to the Present a Common and Disastrous Disposition

BAD bargains are made so often, and by so many people, that Esau's experience is by no means unique. Few people there are who have not at some time disposed of a possession at a price far below its value, and have learned only at a later time how foolish they were. Many have coveted so ardently some thing in the possession of another, that they have given for it a possession the loss of which cripples and hampers their future lives. Some have made bargains of service which have galled and irritated them for years. No one is wise at all times, and, unfortunately, it often happens that in the moments when one is off one's guard, there is some shrewd person at hand to profit by it.

Esau was evidently an impatient, impulsive man. He thought that he would die if he did not get food immediately. His reasoning was logical enough, if his premise had been correct. His birthright was of no value in comparison with his life. But it is very unlikely that his life depended on that one meal, or that no food besides that particular dish could be secured on easier terms. He was hungry, there was a savory dish within reach, and he felt he must have it at any price. Many a young man has fallen into mischief in the same way. It would be well if every parent and teacher made it a rule to teach the children to control the appetites. It would be one of the best elements of training that could be imparted. The drunkard who cannot pass a saloon; the thief who cannot see valuables within his reach without stealing them; the passionate man who cannot meet his enemy without an irresistible impulse to kill him—all might have been saved from falling, if, when boys, some wise, kindly teacher had taught them to keep their appetites and passions under control. We talk in these days a great deal about the evil of anarchy, but the evil we have most cause to dread, is the anarchy in our own being. The wise king spoke truly, when he said that "Greater is he that ruleth his spirit than he who taketh a city." Many a man whom we call great, could do great achievements, but if he were asked to stop drinking, or smoking, or indulging some other propensity, would have to confess that he could not. Few there are so well trained that they have every appetite and impulse so thoroughly under control, that the spirit which ought to rule can say "no" when it will, and have its mandate obeyed.

Primogeniture counted for much in that land and in those times, as it does to this day in monarchical countries. Esau knew well enough what he was selling, but the near-sighted man could think of nothing beyond present gratification. That is the difficulty with which the preacher and the Christian worker have to contend; they cannot get men to see that, apart from right and wrong, it would pay them to turn to God—that he who gives himself to sin wrongs his own soul. If they could succeed in convincing men of that fact and inducing them to act upon it, the time would come when they would love righteousness for its own sake and would follow it even at a loss. But the initial step is the conviction that sin, first and last, is a bad bargain. "Now are we the sons of God," says the apostle, "and it doth not yet appear what we shall be." There may be heights inconceivable to us, which will yet be within our reach if we fulfil present conditions. But there is no hope of any such promotion if we surrender to the flesh. If we live to the flesh we shall die. Therefore we forfeit not only the blessedness, of which we do know, but infinite possibilities. Degenerate sons who do not value their privileges are known in every community. Many a young man is toiling for a pitiful wage, living from hand to mouth, who might be living in comfort and be his father's heir, if he would only live a clean life. So it is with every human being. God waits to welcome him to the privileges of sonship, is ready to help him to overcome the evil in his nature and to make him an heir of God—the highest dignity in the universe. But how many are surrendering all that it implies in order that they may have some ephemeral pleasure that momentarily gratifies their animal nature!

DOUBTERS.

Can Be Changed by Knowledge.

If there is any doubt about making brain power by the use of certain food, the doubter should make the following experiment:

Helen Frances Huntington of Gainesville, Ga., says: "Just a word of commendation concerning Grape-Nuts, which I have found to be the most wholesome, nourishing and appetizing food that has ever come to my knowledge."

I am not a dyspeptic, but being constantly engaged in severe brain work, I found that I did not thrive on ordinary diet; even a moderate dinner dulled my brain so as to be practically incapable of critical work. I tried meat juice, peptonoids, the two-meal system of light breakfast and no supper, which brought on nervous depletion and sleeplessness, so I resorted to one and another of the various health foods, which all seemed alike tasteless and valueless as a brain food, until quite by chance, I had a dish of Grape-Nuts food served as a dessert. I liked it so well that I began to use it daily, for supper, four teaspoonfuls in a saucer of hot milk, eaten before it dissolves to mushiness.

This point should be remembered as, after a certain time, evaporation seems to affect the sweet nutty flavor of the food, as in the case of certain fine-flavored fruits.

The result in my case was simply astonishing. I had no desire whatever for sweet pastries, meats, or in fact anything else; and my brain was as clear and active at night as on awaking from a long, refreshing sleep.

The peculiar advantage about Grape-Nuts food is that it supplies the nutritive qualities of a varied diet without the bad results of heavy eating. I cheerfully recommend its use to all brain workers, if not as an exclusive diet, certainly for the last meal of the day. I always take it with me when traveling, which saves a deal of annoyance and discomfort."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Lost Gospels of the 1st Century*

WHEN Christianity had become partially established by the teaching of Christ and the preaching of his apostles and disciples, there arose among the Christians of the various churches a necessity, and hence a demand, for some written testimonies or records of the life and doctrines of their great Master. But this need was not so apparent or pressing in the first century, and especially during the lifetime of those who had been with Jesus, and had been his followers and companions.

Of the numerous gospels which were in circulation in the second century, not more than three can with any certainty, or with any high degree of probability, be traced back to the times of the apostles. These are the Gospel of Paul, the Gospel or Recollections of Peter, and the Oracles or Sayings of Christ, attributed to Matthew.

Ewald, one of the best of the German critics, concludes that there was a Gospel of Paul; thinks it was in the Greek language, and that it may have been written by the evangelist Philip.

It may be inferred that it afterward became incorporated into the Gospel of Marcion (A.D. 145), since Marcion was a follower of Paul, and for his own gospel claimed the sanction of that apostle.

Marcion was a native of Sinope, a town of Asia Minor, on the south shore of the Black Sea. It is supposed that the church at Sinope was furnished by Paul, at the time of its formation, with a collection such as he supplied to the other Asiatic churches; containing records of the life and teachings of Christ.

It was the opinion of Jerome, and of several other writers, that when Paul spoke of his gospel (Rom. 2: 16; 16: 25; II. Thess. 2: 14), he referred to a written gospel then in circulation.

There is, however, a more distinct trace of the Gospel of Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, ch. 11, vv. 23 to 25. By comparing this passage with Luke 22: 19, 20, it will be seen that the language is almost identical; while the parallel passages, Matt. 26: 26 to 28, and Mark 14: 22 to 24, have no such complete similarity, though the idea is the same. The Gospel of Luke, whether directly, or through Marcion's, was founded partly upon the Gospel of Paul. That Paul had something to do with a written gospel, which now appears, in whole or in part, in the compilation of Luke, is generally acknowledged; and this passage in First Corinthians, taken in connection with the corresponding passage in Luke, is strong evidence that in Corinthians Paul refers to a written gospel, which he had "delivered" to the church at Corinth, and a portion of which written gospel appears in Luke 22: 19, 20. Paul may have referred, also, to the same gospel in Galatians 2: 2.

The opinion of Ewald is, that the Greek Gospel of Paul was the first ever written. There was probably no great length of time intervening between the origin of that and of the other two gospels of the first century. The testimony of Irenæus (A.D. 190), concerning this gospel is, that it was written by Luke. "Luke, also, the companion of Paul, recorded in a book the gospel preached by him." Notwithstanding the positive language here used, the statement is to be taken with some allowance. Irenæus was fully committed to the four gospels, and was engaged in endeavoring to give them authority. He may be said, in fact, to have introduced them to the notice of the literary world; since he is the first author who mentions more than one of them. He speaks frequently of these gospels, and argues that they should be four in number, neither more nor less, because there are four universal winds, and four quarters of the world.

*From The History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200, by Charles B. Waite, A.M. Fifth edition. Pp. 556; cloth binding. Price $2.25. Waite & Co., Chicago, publishers. An invaluable book of reference for Biblical students and scholars generally.

The Gospel or Recollections of Peter was a book more generally known than the Gospel of Paul, and of the existence of which there can be no doubt. In the year 190, a large number of these Gospels of Peter were found in use by the church of Rhossus, in Cilicia; and so much were the Christians of that church attached to them that it became necessary for Serapion, one of the bishops, to suppress them, and to substitute the canonical gospels in their stead.

The Oracles, or Sayings of Christ, in the Aramaic language, we know but little about. It has been generally conceded, on the authority of Eusebius, that Papias (A.D. 125) had such a book, and that he wrote commentaries upon it.

The three gospels were the germs of the three synoptic gospels, respectively. That is, the Gospel of Paul was the germ of the Gospel according to Luke; the Gospel of Peter, of the Gospel according to Mark; and the Oracles, of the Gospel according to Matthew.

Divine Sympathy*

WHAT is thy grief to-day?
A mind mute-burdened with its heavy sorrow,
A soul too faint to see the hopeful morrow,
A life that longs death's drapery to borrow?
Take heart!
He knoweth all thy way,
And makes thine inmost grief his chosen part.

What is thy joy to-day?
A mind in wonder at its own keen knowing,
A soul wherein God's planted truth is growing,
A life with eager, happy love o'erflowing?
Rejoice!
He knoweth all thy way,
And hears with perfect love thy praising voice.

The Rubaiyat of Mirza Mem'n, beautifully printed and bound and richly illustrated. In a note accompanying the volume, the publisher, Henry Olendorf Shepard, says: "Many and beautiful as are the versions of Old Omar now before the public, I venture to believe that on a careful and sympathetic reading you will find the present one worthy of a place among the best. While this paraphrase is in the form of Fitzgerald's, the translator has studiously avoided imitation, and has drawn his 131 quatrains mainly from the prose versions of Nicolas and McCarthy. One who knows has said of it that 'the verbal portion has been constructed with supreme care, every word weighed for the purpose of carrying the deepest import. Many of the strophes are very sonorous, and in several instances are lines and couplets containing the most beautiful pictures clothed in original forms.'" To students and lovers of rare and beautiful books, this volume will be specially welcome. The art, typography, paper and binding are excellent, and form a worthy setting for the famous poem. FIDELITY TRIUMPHANT

Joseph's Trust in God Vindicated by His Advancement

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

God is honored by those who place unswerving confidence in him and in his word. Thirteen years had passed by since Joseph had dreamed of future rule. He had been sold by his brethren for a slave, and passed over two years in prison under a cruel and wicked charge; but his trust in God only deepened, and his communion with him remained unbroken through all the tremendous tests with which God had honored his loyal servant. Man had failed him all through this time of testing. Potiphar, who so highly esteemed him, had listened to the wicked accusations of his wife against Joseph; and the chief butler, the man whose aid he had asked in his time of trouble, had forgotten him. "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help" (Ps. 146: 3). But Joseph knew that he was yet to bear rule, for God had shown it to him.

Meanwhile, there is little doubt that he had been, both for Potiphar and for Pharaoh, a direct sequence of Joseph's prayers that Pharaoh dreamed? One man's communion with God brings God into a house, a city, or a land. Little did the august personage, who dreamed a dream which none of the state counsellors, none of the heathen magicians, none of the wise men of that land could interpret, and of culture could interpret, this marvellous dream was in any way connected with a man who was serving his time as a prisoner in the state prison. Little did Joseph think that his prayer for Pharaoh, a his patient, prayerful waiting for the accomplishment of God's promises were in a way connected. Yet so it was. The dream made a great impression upon the king. The failure of all his heathen priests, a wise counsellors to interpret it made the consciousness that there was something supernatural in this communication all the more marked, and made the king more ready, when God's time was come, to accept his intervention by Joseph.

Pharaoh was in perplexity; the dream was talked at court, and the chief butler called to mind the man who had helped him when he had been in a like position with the king. He came forward with the confession, "I do remember my faults this day," and he related to Pharaoh the circumstances of his dream, and that of the chief baker, in the prison, and of the true interpretations of their dream. It was a last resource for the king, and unhesitatingly he sent for Joseph. What a moment for God's tried servant—to be sent for to stand before the king! The word of the Lord had tried him, but he had been found faithful. Would he not be uplifted? Joseph had no time for preparation other than to shave himself and upon other raiment, but he was found prepared. All the last thirteen years had been a preparation for this moment, and when Pharaoh addressed him, telling of his dream, that none could interpret it, adding, "I have heard say of thee, that thou canst understand a dream to interpret it," Joseph's answer was characteristic, "It is not in me; G shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." Joseph had been God's witness in Potiphar's house, he had been God's witness in prison, he could be nothing else at the court of Pharaoh. They who can witness for God in the midst of his people, but who are all "Hail fellow, well met" with the world, find some day that they have trimmed the world once too often, and that they have their part "with the unbelievers." Joseph's life was described in the words "The Lord was with Joseph"; and circumstances, whether those of a prison or of a court, could not affect his real life; he was ever in the presence of a greater than Pharaoh, before whom he bowed and whom he served. The conscious presence of God gives power and dignity at all times.

Pharaoh told his dreams. "And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one; G hath showed Pharaoh what he is about to do." How did this young man know so quickly the interpretation of the dream, without so much as half an hour to pray over the matter? One who is in the habit of prayer, and who begins his day by communion with God, lives in his presence, and has always open all the day for his voice. Those who pray by fits and starts do not know what it is to live in the sanctuary; and they may need a special preparation to draw nigh unto God. God must have shown Joseph the interpretation as he stood before the king; and he gave it with all the authority of one who was sure of his affair; there was no perhaps. "We seek that we do know, and testify that we have seen" (John 3: 11).

Pharaoh was a heathen king, but like his servant Potiphar, he was able to recognize his superior in a man with whom the Lord dwelt. A profound impression had been made on the king and on his servants. Thus, in the end, the man was exalted who had learned to accept his deep humiliations from the hand of God. Pharaoh said to his servants: "We find such a one as this in whom the Spirit of God is?" Pharaoh recognized G in his words to Joseph: "Forasmuch as God hath showed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art. Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled; only in the throne will I be greater than thou." And Pharaoh appointed Joseph to be second in Egypt, gave him his signet ring, and all the insignia of office. There was something truly great and noble in this king, who would brave caste—feeling and national pride, in thus appointing a foreigner—and one who came straight out of prison, having entered Egypt as a slave—to so high a position, and so suddenly. But Pharaoh saw for himself, and judged for himself what was for the benefit of his people. Would that more kings resembled him!

Northern Ogadens, Abyssinia. Mounted on his camel, and followed by a train of infatuated believers, he makes a picturesque figure in the desert as he journeys from place to place, fleeing before the Anglo-Abyssinian forces which have thus far failed to capture him, and to whom he has given a great deal of trouble.

The "Breaking Plow" Evangelist

THIS summer I had the pleasure of camping with Rev. John Willan and his family while he was holding a camp-meeting in Northern Wisconsin. A few years ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD printed an account of camp-meetings held by Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Willan in the Kickapoo Valley. Mr. Willan is sent out by the Wisconsin State Home Missionary Society, and travels in the sparsely settled districts of that region, preaching and planting churches. He is often called the "Breaking Plow Evangelist," as his work takes him in places where no preaching has ever been heard. Oftentimes, when he can go no further with his team of Indian ponies, an account of the roads, he has to go on horseback through the woods for ten or fifteen miles. This might be pleasant during the summer months, but is very hard and difficult in winter and spring. Many times, in his circuit of 200 or 300 miles, he has to break his own way through the snow, or travel roads hub-deep with mud or water; but nothing seems to daunt him in his work. He has his reward from his Master, and people who everywhere receive him gladly.

In summer, he holds tent meetings wherever there is an opening. These are usually well attended. There is no division on account of sect. This year, at Martin, Wis., Mr. Willan conducted the services in a half-finished church and lived in a tent close by. One earnest, Christian man fixed up his big farm wagon with seats, and went down his road every night, assisting people who had no teams but who wished to come. Every Sunday afternoon a band of Christians conducts a flourishing Sunday School. A prayer-meeting has been started which will be the "pulse" of the church. These Home Missionaries are doing a great work, although the outer world may hear little about them. A. E. B.

ABANDONED IT.

For the Old-Fashioned Coffee Was Killing.

"I always drank coffee with the rest of the family, for it seemed as if there was nothing for breakfast if we did not have it on the table.

I had been troubled some time with my heart, which did not feel right. This trouble grew worse steadily.

Sometimes it would beat fast, and at other times very slowly, so that I would hardly be able to do work for an hour or two after breakfast, and if I walked up a hill, it gave me a severe pain.

I had no idea of what the trouble was until a friend suggested that perhaps it might be caused by coffee drinking. I tried leaving off the coffee and began drinking Postum Cereal Food Coffee. The change came quickly. I am now glad to say that I am entirely well of the heart trouble, and attribute the relief to leaving off coffee and the use of Postum Cereal Food Coffee.

A number of my friends have abandoned the old-fashioned coffee and have taken up with Postum, which they are using steadily. There are some people that make Postum very weak and tasteless, but if it is boiled long enough, according to directions, it is a very delicious beverage. We have never used any of the old-fashioned coffee since it was first started in our house." Mrs. L. A. Smith, Blodgett Mills, Cortland Co., N. Y.

HELD BY BRIGANDS FOR A RANSOM

Miss Stone, the Prisoner of Bulgarian Bandits = Three Governments Working Earnestly for Her Rescue

MISSIONARY circles and the friends of missionary effort throughout the globe are deeply agitated over the capture by brigands, near the Turkish-Bulgarian frontier, of Miss Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary and a companion of Mrs. Tsilka, the wife of an Albanian preacher. Some of the facts concerning this remarkable abduction have already appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but the details since received add greatly to the interest and importance of the case.

Miss Stone, with a party of native Christians connected with the missions, was traveling from Bansko to Djumas (about one hundred miles east of Salonica) in the mountain ranges of Macedonia near the Bulgarian frontier, through a part of the country which is usually considered safe. Among the party was Mrs. Katarina Stephana Tsilka, a native of Albania and a Christian convert. While the party was passing through a vale in the mountains, there suddenly appeared groups of men, one in front, in the ordinary dress of the country, the other behind them, dressed as Turkish soldiers. All the party were made prisoners, and were subjected to a search for valuables. After taking their money, jewelry and watches, the plunderers (who spoke the Bulgarian language, though dressed as Turks) liberated all except Miss Stone and Mrs. Tsilka. This occurred on September 3. The main body of the party found their way to a place of safety, some of them crying the news of the abduction to the American Board Mission at Samakov, in European Turkey. Two of the students who were with Miss Stone at the time of the attack made this statement:

"The whole party—about fifteen to eighteen—were suddenly stopped in a narrow valley, and were compelled to wade the river and ascend the wooded mountain side as fast as their feet could make time. Not all the brigands could be seen, but twenty were counted at one time, and it was the opinion that there must have been forty of them, dressed like Turks, but being bad Turkish.

They spoke occasionally good Bulgarian. They knew Miss Stone, showing that they were mainly after her. She and Mrs. Tsilka were taken on further and seen no more. The remainder were relieved of valuables and compelled to stay all night under strict guard. After sunrise, the brigands who watched them went up the mountain and the remainder of the party were free. The teachers and Bible-women returned to Bansko." As a full day elapsed before the authorities could be informed of the abduction, the brigands had an opportunity to escape with their captives to a place of security, remote from the scene of their lawless exploit. It quickly became apparent that the outlaws had a definite purpose in the capture of Miss Stone, for Mrs. Tsilka, who was taken with her and also held prisoner for a time, was liberated and sent to Bansko, to procure money for the prisoner's pressing needs. It was also announced that the outlaws demanded a ransom of twenty-five thousand Turkish pounds ($110,000) for Miss Stone's liberation. This demand was mentioned in a letter from Miss Stone to Rev. Dr. Haskell, American Board Missionary at Samakov, and a place was named where the brigands would receive the money, after which, so they pledged their word, the prisoner would be restored to her friends. Mrs. Tsilka was the bearer of a letter from Miss Stone to her friends. "She gave me the letter," said the Albanian woman, "and then she took a cross from her neck, held it up and prayed to God for deliverance." When Mrs. Tsilka came away, the captive missionary was still kneeling in the attitude of earnest prayer.

On the demand for ransom becoming known, there was great indignation among the missionaries and converts. Both the Bulgarian Government and that of Turkey began active measures with a view to hunting down the brigands, and the American Government was duly notified by its representative of the abduction and subsequent events. Four battalions of Turkish infantry were sent to the Bulgarian frontier, and ten companies of Bulgarian troops were also massed there, the two forces uniting in an effort to capture the outlaws. An infantry force was sent to search the mountain defiles near the scene of the abduction, and all the frontier passes were closely watched. In Sofia, the Bulgarian police made several arrests of suspected persons, who were believed to be accomplices. It is reported that the leader of the abductors is Bous Sarafou, President of a revolutionary committee in Macedonia, and that he and his followers planned the capture to embarrass the Government, and involve it in political complications with Turkey. Sarafou is said to be a desperate character, who would hesitate at no crime, if he found his plans thwarted.

A somewhat different light is thrown upon the situation in a statement made by B. Wardlaw Thomson, an American in Samakov. He declares that the capture of Miss Stone was not the act of mere brigands, but a

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. These questions are printed Four weeks in advance so as to afford our readers an opportunity to answer them.

II. For answers to the questions which appear below, when accepted, we will allow compensation for the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append their name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Nov. 13

1. A Western Sunday School is divided on the problem presented in the parable of the Prodigal Son, as to which was the better character of the two, the one who left his father's home or the one who remained there. What is the solution?

2. Is it better to use the singular, or the plural, verb in speaking of the United States? "The United States is" or "The United States are"?

3. What is the best answer to give to persistent borrowers of books, instruments, etc., who keep them a long time and sometimes do not return them at all. Is this a case in which we should "do good and lend, hoping for nothing again" (Luke 6: 35)?

4. Is a pastor justified in urging his people to vote a certain political ticket at the elections?

5. If a woman brings suit for divorce, and the husband is innocent of the charges brought against him, but is willing that his wife should get a divorce, should he allow the case to go against him by default, or should he vindicate himself, at the risk of perpetuating an uncongenial union?

Questions of the Week

1. Would the use of a liturgy in church be more conducive to a devotional spirit than extempore prayer?

A liturgy, or form of service, must not degenerate into a formal service. Properly understood, the liturgy quickens, develops and guides the Christian consciousness and church life of a people, and is the surest safeguard against fanaticism. The Jews, under the old dispensation, had their liturgy, and Christ used it and so sanctioned it (Luke 4: 15). He also taught a form of prayer. To say that one cannot worship God "in spirit and in truth" under the forms used by Christians for centuries, expressive and beautiful as they are, is as though one should say that they cannot truly sing printed hymns in praise of God. In a lecture on "Worship in Non-Liturgical Churches," Dr. Boardman said: "We need forms of devotion as well as the spirit of devotion. The older I grow, the more incompetent I feel for attempting to lead the people's devotions extemporaneously. As the flying years bring with them more of experience and observation, the more I shrink from the possible disasters incident to extemporaneous prayers—for instance, grammatical blunders, tortuous movements, forced retreats, explanatory parentheses, ill-timed allusions, unfortunate reminiscences, and oblivious as unfortunate, unintentional exaggerations, personal idiosyncrasies, capricious moods, theological processes, conscious mentalities; in one word, egoism. . . . Why take such pains to elaborate our sermons before finite, sinful men, and yet presume to extemporize our prayers before an infinite and sinless God?"

G. E. KRAUTH.

This question cannot be answered by an unqualified yes or no. Some who have been brought up with a liturgy, always prefer that form of prayer. In the case of some, I believe it is an advantage to know the words that are coming, and these catch beforehand the spirit of the words. I apprehend that this would be the class of people who are mentally rather shallow, but inclined to be spiritually devout. I have no doubt at all, in my own mind, that the same words repeated over and over again tends to formality with the great majority. For my own part, I would not even repeat the Lord's Prayer at every service, for I know that in myself at least, the words would in part lose their effect. I may say, too, that I have known several persons who, through marriage or otherwise, have left the Anglican Church to worship in the Free, and who would by no means return to liturgical forms; but I cannot recall any case in which a person brought up to free prayer become encumbered of a liturgy. What is needed is earnest, intelligent, devout extempore prayer; with this, I believe, there would not be much demand for set forms. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

2. When a young woman, who has received a college training and actually entered upon her profession, under good auspices, marries, is it advisable to drop her profession, or to continue it to the fullest extent her relationship will permit?

The young woman would certainly be justified in continuing the practice of her profession as far as her marriage relations would allow; but in a majority of cases, if she fulfilled her duties as a wife, there would be no place for her profession. The average man wishes in his wife a home-maker, housekeeper might have been had she heeded the voice of ambition. After all, no rule can be formulated as to woman's course after marriage. It is a question of temperament, training and opportunity, and each must decide for herself.

3. A metaphor is used in the Bible to describe death, the law and God's care over his people. Name the metaphor and the places where it is used.

A shadow. DEATH—Job 10: 21: "Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness, and the shadow of death." Job 16: 16: "My face is foul with weeping, and on my eyelids is the shadow of death." Psalm 23: 4: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, etc." See also Job 24: 17; 28: 3; 34: 22; 38: 17. Psalm 44: 19; 107: 10; Isaiah 9: 2; Jer. 2: 6, 13; 16; Matt. 4: 16; Luke 1: 79. LAW—Heb. 10: 1: "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very gift to man. There is nothing in this world more sacred and more beautiful than the mother's love for her child. She who, in her efforts in sorrow, soothes away pain by her gentle touch, quiets all fears, charms away vexation, trouble or remorse by her affection, and holds to her heart though all the world forsake or treat with contempt. Such indulgence, which spoils a child, is often considered as pure love, but the supreme love at God expected the parent to exercise his will to the child, physically, intellectually, and morally, and the affection either part may have for the child is only an illustration of our capacity and readiness to reach pure love. We shall find as we approach the understanding of God's love, each child at we have is better and dearer, and we realize that this faculty which is placed in the human heart is to be made just as pure, noble and great, as man is capable of.

Tabret is a contraction of tabret. The Hebrew tabh is undoubtedly the instrument described by travelers as the drum of the Arabs. It was played principally by women. Ex. 15: 20; Judges 11: 34; 1 Sam. 18: 6, 18; 19: 25, as an accompaniment to the song and dance. The drum of the Arabs is described by Russell as "a hoop sometimes with pieces of brass fixed in it to make a jingling over which a peculiar rhythm is struck. It is beaten with the fingers, and is the true companion of the ancient." In Babylon it is called tab.

and companion, and no woman can accomplish this and at the same time do justice to a profession. If she attempts to do both, she will surely specialize in one at the expense of the other. The only exception would be that of a woman without home cares, who, practicing the same profession as her husband, should thus by sympathizing with his pursuits, become to him the companion and helpmeet he desires.

M. L. M.

The question is an absorbing one, and is capable of being answered both affirmatively and negatively. I know of a home where the wife and mother finds recreation in the pursuit of a profession in which she was trained before marriage—that of literature, and I can readily understand how an artist, a physician, a dentist, a designer, an architect, a milliner, might still continue a professional calling, even after marriage, and without causing unhappiness. Why should years of preparation be wasted? These, however, I admit, are exceptional cases. Generally speaking, a woman is wise in laying aside all professional ambition when she weds, for then she "gives hostage to fortune to prevent great undertakings," in other words, she, for love's sake, pledges herself to self-effacement, and to become a dear household deity, instead of what she image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offer year by year, continually make the comers thereunto perfect." Isaiah 51: 16: "And I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand, that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, thou art my people." Also Psalm 63: 7; 91: 1; Isa. 25: 4; 32: 2; 49: 2; Lam. 4: 20.

4. Can one love his child too much?

Most certainly not. It is the lever that rules the world, and it is God's second best before all else, even before his children. He loves his child too much if he indulges in every whim, passes its faults uncorrected, and its young passions uncontrolled; if he applies it freely with money; if he consents to its evasion of salutary discipline and school tasks; if he neglects its moral training because the child finds it "tiresome"; if he praises its very faults as virtues and thereby encourages it in conceit and arrogance; in these ways, one may love too much, to the hurt and ultimate ruin of the child's life nature.

J. A.

Yes, undoubtedly. Many a father makes an idol of his child. Said a fond father to me yesterday, as he pointed to his lovely daughter, "How I do love that dear girl." He decided impression made was that he not only loved her better than life, but also better than all else beside. The Master settles this matter so clearly and decidedly, that we need make no mistake. (See Matt. 10: 37). He that loveth son or daughter more than his is not worthy of me." Also Luke 14: 26: If any man come to me, and hate not his children, . . . yea, and his own life also, cannot be my disciple." That is, if a man places any object above Christ in his affection, he cannot be his disciple.

5. What should be done with lazy men who have families of small children, when they have acquired the habit of looking to benevolent people for the support of their children, who would starve if they were not helped?

In view of the fact that every experient tried heretofore has failed to solve the problem, yet it is not worth while to follow it this suggestion: Establish a State institution on a large scale, under competent, intelligent, and sympathetic management, where the indigents shall be required to serve time of tender service (buy their own liberty) where there is a great variety of methods of employment and occupation (for these unfortunate need a sort of kindergarten treatment) having their work changed quite frequently, ascertaining that which gives them more stimulus of labor than others. The uninviting work is a tremendous mistake, so far as offering incentive to better and more useful life, which is our principal aim. The institution should be self-supporting in time, and by a judicious system of rewards, penalties, and recompense for services, under humane treatment, I think if these poor unfortunates are ever to receive any inspiration to a useful life, and find their sphere, it would be there.

WALTER W. HUBBARD

A man of this kind should be first taken aside by a tactful person and kindly, and plainly, shown what relation he bears to society, and what relation he should bear. He should be made to realize that the speaker is interested in his welfare, and suitable employment should, if possible, be provided, that he may have no excuse for remaining idle. If this method of awakening his manhood fails, he should be warned that if he made no endeavor to provide for his family he would be prosecuted for vagrancy. This will likely effect a cure. If not, he should be arrested without much trouble to those supporting his kindred. By taking this step, society will be relieved of a parasite, at least for a time. Other unprincipled idlers, learning a lesson, may see the need of a change in their habits; and the prisoner himself will doubtless reform, after a sentence or two in the workhouse.

PORTO ★ RICO'S ★ INAUGURATION ★ DAY

PORTO RICO seems well pleased with her new Governor. Hon. William H. Hunt, and her new Governor has many good reasons to be well pleased with Porto Rico. He has been most warmly welcomed. His inauguration, which took place under circumstances rendering it as sad as impressive, was marked by exceeding good will toward the new Executive.

A Governor Hunt said in his brief address, "What would have been a great holiday had suddenly become address outlining his political policy, was, naturally, dispensed with, and the Governor spoke of him who was in all hearts—the nation's dead—and expressed his sincere appreciation of the manifestations of popular grief in nor and his wife, and then passed quietly out of the building.

A pleasant incident of the day was the reception by the Governor of a beautiful testimonial from the people of Mayaguez, presented through Mr. Mateo Fajardo, the Mayor. It is an eagle mounted upon the trunk of a tree, with outspread wings, just in the posture of alighting, and bearing in its beak a letter addressed to the Governor. The whole figure is six or eight inches a time of universal grief;" less than a hundred persons were present to witness the simple ceremony initiating him into the duties of his office. The meeting was held in the Council Chamber of the Executive Mansion at San Juan. The company included the Chief Justice and associate Justices of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico, the members of the Executive Council and the House of Delegates, the heads of the Executive Departments, the Bishop of Porto Rico, the Rev. Dr. Drees, the Alcalde and other city officials of San Juan, and a few invited guests. During the ceremony, an Insular policeman stood back of the Governor holding a standard bearing the new coat-arms of the island. The day was Monday, Sept. 16, when President McKinley's body was on its way from Buffalo to Washington. Dr. Brumbaugh, who opened the meeting, said, in part:

"The late lamented President of the United States, on the 27th day of August, commissioned the Hon. William H. Hunt to be Governor of Porto Rico, and accepted the resignation of the Hon. Charles H. Allen, to take effect on the fifteenth day of September. In pursuance of law thereof, we have met in this solemn hour to attend to the inauguration of the Hon. William H. Hunt."

The Right Reverend J. H. Blew, Catholic Bishop of Porto Rico, followed with an eloquent prayer for "the welfare, the success, the happiness, and prosperity of our island, and our beloved friend, the distinguished Governor of Porto Rico." The prayer included a most fervent petition for "our country overwhelmed with grief" because "our great, our beloved President McKinley has been stricken down by a most cruel blow." Chief Quinones then administered the oath of office, which pledges the Governor "to support, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Porto Rico against all enemies, foreign and domestic." After repeating the oath, the Governor signed written copies of it in Spanish and English. The regular inaugural Porto Rico. He said: "Words of sympathy and condolence have come from every point in the island, from the hamlets in the mountains, the valleys, and the cities by the sea. No cables can properly convey to the main-high, done in silver, except the envelope of the letter, which is of gold. It is local handiwork and reflects credit on Mayaguez, at the same time that it bears testimony to the Governor's popularity among the Porto Ricans and to their desire to support him earnestly and honestly in the duties of his high office. Another and a very solid indication of the attitude of the islanders was given the day after his inauguration, when a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce of Porto Rico notified him of his appointment as the Honorary President of that body, "as an expression of gratitude for co-operation with the Chamber's work in behalf of our commercial community."

The loyalty and patriotism of our beautiful little island has been demonstrated in a way that must endear her to all her sisters on the mainland. No State here has shown profounder grief for our President. All her cities and hamlets went into mourning; all her bells tolled; all her cannons boomed; in her public buildings and churches there were memorial meetings, where her prominent citizens voiced public sorrow and her preachers of all creeds prayed for "our country," and for "La Senora McKinley." The San Juan News is advocating the erection of a McKinley monument there as a fitting tribute "to the one most loved by the people of this island." The little town of Manati decided at once to erect a tablet to his memory, inscribing it with his name in gold letters. The same loyalty which prompted grief for the dead President, is showing itself in kindly expressions toward Mr. Roosevelt.

In matters commercial and educational, the island is making progress. A bright future is before her. Her newspapers and her prominent men are showing a commendable public spirit and an enterprise which must tell in favor of the island's enlarged prosperity. Her charms as a winter resort will contribute, too, to her development.

land the truth of this widespread sentiment here. I thank the people, and can only say that my highest ambition is to be worthy of the great trust confided to me for them by the patriot we mourn."

Third Watch of the Night

TEXT --- Isa. 21: 11:
Watchman, what of the night?

WHEN night came down on Babylon, Nineveh, and Jerusalem, they needed careful watching, otherwise the incendiary's torch might have been thrust into the very heart of the metropolitan splendor; or enemies, marching from the hills, might have forced the gates. All night long, on top of the wall and in front of the gates, might be heard the measured step of the watchman on his solitary beat; silence hung in air, save as some passer-by raised the question, "Watchman, what of the night?"

The ancients divided their night into four parts—the first watch, from six to nine; the second, from nine to twelve; the third, from twelve to three; and the fourth, from three to six. I speak now of the city in the third watch, or from twelve to three o'clock.

I never weary of looking upon the life of the city in the first watch. That is the hour when the stores are closing. The laboring men, having quitted the scaffolding and the shop, are on their way home. It rejoices me to give them my seat in the city car. They have stood and hammered away all day. Their feet are weary. They are exhausted with the tug of work. They are mostly cheerful. With appetites sharpened on the swift turner's wheel and the carpenter's whetstone, they seek the evening meal. The clerks, too, have broken away from the counter, and with brain weary of the long line of figures and the whims of those who go a-shopping, seek the face of mother, or wife and child. The streets are thronged with young men setting out from the great centres of bargain-making. Let idlers clear the street and give right of way to the besweated artisans and merchants! They have earned their bread and are now on their way home to get it. The lights in full jet hang over ten thousand evening repasts—the parents at either end of the table, the children between. Thank God, "who setteth the solitary in families."

The Watch of Relaxation

A few hours later and all the places of amusement, good and bad, are in full tide. Lovers of art, catalogue in hand, stroll through the galleries and discuss the pictures. The ball-room is resplendent with the rich apparel of those who, on either side of the white, glistening boards, await the signal from the orchestra. Concert-halls are lifted into enchantment with the warble of one songstress, or swept out on a sea of tumultuous feeling by the blast of brazen instruments. Drawing-rooms are filled with all gracefulness of apparel, with all sweetness of sound, with all splendor of manner; mirrors are catching up and multiplying the scene, until it seems as if in infinite corridors there were garlanded troops advancing and retreating. The dashing span, adrip with the foam of the long country ride, rushes past as you halt at the curb-stone. Mirth, revelry, beauty, fashion, magnificence, mingle in the great metropolitan picture, until the thinking man goes home to think more seriously, and the praying man to pray more earnestly. A beautiful and overwhelming thing is the city in the first and second watches of the night.

But the clock strikes twelve, and the third watch has begun. The thunder of the city has rolled out of the air. The slightest sounds cut the night with such distinctness as to attract your attention. The tinkling of the bell of the street car in the distance and the baying of the dog. The stamp of a horse in the next street. The slamming of a saloon door. The hiccough of the drunkard. The shrieks of the steam-whistle five miles away. Oh, how suggestive, my friends, the third watch of the night!

There are honest men passing up and down the street. Here is a city missionary, who has been carrying a scuttle of coal to that poor family in that dark place. Here is an undertaker going up the steps of a building from which there comes a bitter cry, which indicates that the destroying angel has smitten the first-born. Here is a minister of religion who has been giving the sacrament to a dying Christian. Here is a physician passing along in great haste. Nearly all the lights have gone out in the dwellings, for it is the third watch of the night. That light in the window, is the light of the watcher, for the medicines must be administered, and the fever must be watched, and the restless tossing off of the coverlid must be resisted, and the ice must be kept on the hot temples, and the perpetual prayer must go up from hearts soon to be broken.

Oh, the third watch of the night! What a stupendous thought!—a whole city at rest! Weary arm preparing for to-morrow's toil. Hot brain being cooled off. Rigid muscles relaxed. Excited nerves soothed. The white hair of the octogenarian in thin drifts across the pillow, fresh fall of flakes on snow already fallen.

Childhood, with its dimpled hands thrown out on the pillow, and with every breath taking in a new store of fun and frolic. Third watch of the night! God's slumberless eye will look. Let one great wave of refreshing slumber roll over the heart of the great town, submerging care, and anxiety, and worry, and pain. Let the city sleep.

But, my friends, be not deceived. There will be to-night thousands who will not sleep at all. Go up that dark alley, and be cautious where you tread, lest you fall over the prostrate form of a drunkard lying on his own doorstep. Look about you, lest you feel the garrotter's hug. Look through the broken window-pane, and see what you can see. You say, "Nothing." Then listen. What is it? "God help us!" No footlights, but tragedy ghastlier and mightier than Ristori or Edwin Booth ever enacted. No light, no fire, no bread, no hope. Shivering in the cold, they have had no food for twenty-four hours. You say, "Why don't they beg?" They do, but they get nothing. You say, "Why don't they deliver themselves over to the almshouse?" Ah! you would not ask that if you ever heard the bitter cry of a man or a child when told he must go to the almshouse. "Oh," you say, "they are vicious poor, and therefore they do not deserve our sympathy." Are they vicious? So much more.

They Need Your Pity

The Christian poor, God helps them. Through their night there twinkles the round, merry star of hope, and through the broken window they see the crystals of heaven; but the vicious poor, they are more to be pitied. Their last light has gone out. You excuse yourself from helping them by saying they are so bad they brought this trouble on themselves. I reply, Where I give ten prayers for the innocent who are suffering I will give twenty for the guilty who are suffering.

Pass on through the alley. Open the door. "Oh," you say, "it is locked." No, it is not locked. It has never been locked. No burglar would be tempted to go in there to steal anything. The door is never locked. Only a broken chair stands against the door. Shove it back. Go in. Strike a match. Now, look. Beastliness and rags. See those glaring eyeballs. Be careful now what you say. Do not utter any insult, do not utter any suspicion, if you value your life. What is that red mark on the wall? It is the mark of a murderer's hand! Look at those two eyes rising up out of the darkness and out from the straw in the corner, coming toward you, and as they come near you your light goes out. Strike another match. Ah! this is a babe, not like those beautiful children presented in baptism. This little one never smiled; it never will smile. A flower flung on an awfully barren beach. O Heavenly Shepherd, fold that little one in thy arms! Wrap around you your shawl or your coat tighter, for the cold wind sweeps through.

Strike another match. Ah! is it possible that the scarred and bruised face of that young woman ever was looked into by maternal tenderness? Utter no scorn, Utter no harsh word. No ray of hope has dawned on that brow for many a year. No ray of hope ever will dawn on that brow. But the light has gone out. Do not strike another light. It would be a mockery to kindle another light in such a place as that. Pass out and pass down the street. Our cities are full of such homes, and the worst time the third watch of the night.

The Criminal's Watch

Do you know it is in this third watch of the night that criminals do their worst work? It is the criminal's watch. At half-past eight o'clock you will find them in the drinking-saloon, but toward twelve o'clock they go to their garrets, they get out their tools, then they start on the street. Watching on either side for the police, they go to their work of darkness. This is a burglar, and the false key will soon touch the store lock. This is an incendiary, and before morning there will be a light on the sky, and a cry of "Fire! fire!" Many of these poor creatures were brought up in that way. They were born in a thieves' garret. Their childish toy was a burglar's dark lantern. The first thing they remember was their mother bandaging the brow of their father, struck by the police club. They began by robbing boys' pockets, and now they have come to dig the underground passage to the cellar of the bank, and are preparing to blast the gold-vault. Just so long as there are neglected children of the street, just so long we will have these desperadoes.

In the third watch of the night gambling does its worst work. What though the hours be slipping away, and though the wife be waiting in the cheerless home? Stir up the fire. Bring on more drinks. Put up more stakes. That commercial house that only a little ago put out a sign of copartnership will this winter be wrecked on a gambler's table. There will be no money-till that will spring a leak. In the third watch of the night pass down the streets of these cities, and you hear the click of the dice, and the sharp, keen stroke of the balls on the billiard-table. At these places gambler, chancier, and legislators, tired of making laws, take a respite in breaking them. All classes of people are robbed by this crime—the importer of foreign silks and the dealer in Chatham street pocket-handkerchiefs.

Gambling and Drinking

In one year, in New York city, there were seven million dollars sacrificed at the gaming-table. Perhaps some of your friends have been smitten of this sin. Perhaps some of you have been smitten by it. Perhaps there may be a stranger here from some of the hotels. Look out for those agents of iniquity who tarry around about the hotels, and ask you, "Would you like to see the city?" "Yes." "Have you ever seen that splendid building up-town?" "No." Then the villain will undertake to show you what he calls the "lions" and the "elephants," and after a young man, through morbid curiosity or through badness of soul, has seen the "lions" and the "elephants," he will be on enchanted ground. Look out for these men who move around the hotels with sleek hats—always sleek hats—and patronizing air, and unaccountable interest in your welfare and entertainment. You are a fool if you cannot see through it. They want your money.

In the third watch of the night, also, drunkenness does its worst. The drinking will be respectable at eight o'clock in the evening, a little flushed at nine, all active and garrulous at ten, at eleven blasphemous, at twelve the hat falls off, at one the man falls to the ground asking for more drink. Strewn through the drinking-saloons of the city, fathers, husbands, sons as good as you are by nature, perhaps better. In the high circles of society it is hushed up. A merchant prince gets noisy and uncontrollable, is taken by his followers, who try to get him to bed, or take him home, where he falls flat in the entry. Do not wake the children. They have had disgrace enough.

My friends, you see all around about you the need that something radical be done. You do not see the worst. In the midnight meetings in London a great multitude have been saved. We want a few hurried Christian men and women to come down from the highest circles of society to toil amid these wandering and destitute ones, and kindle up a light in the dark day, even the gladness of heaven. Do not go wrapped in your fine furs and from your well-filled tables, with the idea that pious talk is going to stop the gnawing of an empty stomach or to warm stockingless feet. Take bread, take raiment, take medicine, as well as take pity. There is a great deal of common-sense in what the poor woman said to the city missionary when he was telling her how she ought to love God and serve him. "Oh," she said, "if you were as poor and cold as I am, and as hungry, you could think of nothing else!"

Practical Help Needed

A great deal of what is called Christian work goes for nothing, for the simple reason it is not practical. As after the battle of Antietam a man got out of an ambulance with a bag of tracts, and he went distributing the tracts, and George Stuart, one of the best Christians in this country, said to him, "What are you distributing tracts for now? There are three thousand men being led to death. Bind up their wounds, and then distribute the tracts." We want more common-sense in Christian work, taking the bread of this life in one hand and the bread of the next life in the other hand. I rejoice more in God that never are sympathetic words uttered, never a prayer offered, never a Christian alms-giving indulged in but it is blessed. There is a place in Switzerland. I have been told, where the utterance of one word will bring back a score of echoes; and I have to tell you that a sympathetic word, a kind word, a generous word, a helpful word, uttered in the dark places of the town will bring back ten thousand echoes from heaven. Are there in this assemblage those who know by experience the tragedies in the third watch of the night? I am not here to thrust you back with one hard word. Take the bandage from your bruised soul, and put on it the soothing salve of Christ's Gospel and of God's compassion. I tell you there is more delight in heaven over one man that gets reformed by the grace of God than over ninety and nine that never got off the track.

I could give you the history in a minute of one of the best friends I ever had. Outside of my own family political plot, deliberately planned, for the purpose of exciting international feeling against Turkey. He adds, however, that both governments are making strenuous efforts for her rescue.

This hopeful message was confirmed by a despatch to the Associated Press from Sofia, stating that United States Consul Dickerson had secured the consent of the brigands to an extension of one month, a portion of the ransom to be deposited meanwhile.

Conflicting reports concerning Miss Stone's condition have come over the cable. One cablegram represents her as in a pitiable plight from weakness, caused by being dragged from hiding-place to hiding-place by her

United States Government has already taken such action in the matter as may hasten the rescue and ultimately result in the two responsible governments bringing the aggressors to justice. The abductors, it is said, had boldly announced that the ransom must be paid not later than Oct. 8, but no alternative was mentioned. There were no apprehensions of violence, and the officials of the American Board of Foreign Missions believe that, as soon as the brigands receive that the threats and demands are unavailing and that no ransom will be paid, they will release their captive. To yield to their demands and pay a ransom would be to give such an impulse to brigandage that no missionary in the East would be safe.

A different view of the case was taken by the State Department at Washington. It was believed that Miss Stone was in imminent peril, and that the brigands were not likely to be influenced by sentimental motives or swayed from their purpose by appeals for mercy. They would carry out their threat of death, or a worse fate, unless the money were promptly paid. This opinion was shared by many people, and it was decided by the relatives of Miss Stone, and their pastors, to appeal to the whole nation to subscribe the ransom. The appeal was issued through the American Board. At the last hour, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was urgently requested to assist in the movement of the raising of the ransom. It did so gladly, and soon the telegraph wires were flashing messages to liberal hearts in many States, and an army of messengers was busy bearing communications to wealthy merchants in New York City resulting in over $2,000 within five or six hours.

On Tuesday, Oct. 8, the day set for the ransom to be paid, something less than one-half the amount had been contributed. To relieve anxiety, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cabled to Mr. Peet, representative of the American Board in Constantinople, inquiring whether it was possible to gain an extension of time beyond Oct. 8. This answer came by the cable:

She took four American diplomas; one at the Moody Schools at Northfield, a second at the Sloan Maternity, a third at the Presbyterian Training School for Nurses, and a fourth in Obstetrics at Cornell. She was married in 1900, sailing immediately afterwards for Macedonia.

All the expenses connected with these operations are borne by the proprietor of this paper. We wish here to acknowledge our indebtedness for the hearty and practical co-operation of the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Postal Telegraph Company, both of which companies very generously handled all telegrams expeditiously and free of expense.

It will be observed that among the contributors is His Excellency, Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister in Washington, who takes this opportunity of showing his gratitude for the generosity with which America helped China in the recent famine and flood troubles. J. & W. Seligman is one of the leading banking firms in the country and represents the Hebrew element.

Now that the time for paying the ransom has been extended, an opportunity is afforded to all friends of missionary effort to co-operate in saving Miss Stone. Fifty thousand dollars more must be raised before the ransom can be fully paid and the peril averted. We trust that many of our readers will aid this worthy effort by sending in their contributions quickly. Every sum will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

ney had a better friend. He welcomed me to my home at the West. He was of splendid personal appearance; but he had an ardor of soul and a warmth of affection that made me love him like a brother. I saw me coming out of the saloons, and I saw him going down, and I had a fair talk with him. So the time went on. After awhile the day of sickness came. I was summoned to his sick-bed. I hastened. It took me but very few moments to get there. I knelt and prayed. That night his soul went to the Lord who made it.

Arrangements were made for the obsequies. The question was raised whether they should bring him to the church. Somebody said: "You cannot bring such a solemn man as that into the church." I said: "You will bring him in church; he stood by me when he was alive, and I will stand by him when he is dead. Bring him." As I stood in the pulpit and saw them carrying the body up the aisle, I felt as if I could weep tears of blood. On one side of the pulpit sat his little child of eight years, a sweet beautiful little girl, that I had seen him hug convulsively in his better moments. She knew not what it all meant. She was not old enough to understand the sorrow of an orphan. On the other side sat the men who ruined him; they were the men who had poured the wormwood into the orphan's cup. I knew them. How did they seem to feel? Did they weep? No. Did they say: "What a pity that so generous a man should be destroyed?" No; they sat there, looking as vultures look at the carcass of a lamb whose heart they have ripped out. So they sat and looked at the coffin-lid, and I told them the judgment of God upon those who had destroyed their fellows. Did they reform? I was told they were in the places of iniquity that night after my friend was laid in Oakwood Cemetery, and they blasphemed and they drank. Oh, how merciless men are, especially after they have destroyed you! Do not look to men for comfort or help. But there is a man who will not reform. He says: "I won't reform." Well, then, how many acts are there in a tragedy? I believe there are five acts in a tragedy.

Act the first of the tragedy: A young man starting off from home; parents and sisters weeping to have him go. Wagon rising over the hill. Farewell kiss flung back. Ring the bell and let the curtain fall.

Act the second: The marriage altar. Full organ.

Bright lights. Long white veil trailing through the aisle. Prayer and congratulation, and exclamation of: "How well she looks!"

Act the third: A woman waiting for staggering steps. Old garments stuck into the broken window-pane. Marks of hardship on the face. The biting of the nails of bloodless fingers. Neglect and cruelty and despair. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act the fourth: Three graves in a dark place—grave of the child that died for lack of medicine, grave of the wife that died of a broken heart, grave of the man that died of dissipation. Oh, what a blasted heath with three graves! Plenty of weeds, but no flowers. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act the fifth: A destroyed soul's eternity. No light. No music. Blackness of darkness forever. But I cannot look any longer. Woe! woe! I close my eyes to this last act of the tragedy. Quick! Quick! Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart rejoice in the days of thy youth; but know thou, that for all these things God will bring you into judgment." "There is a way that seemeth right to a man but the end thereof is death."

A GREAT PROTESTANT SHRINE

Hon. Chas. A. Schieren Writes of his Journey to Speyer and the Progress of the New Cathedral

WHILE in Germany recently, I visited the city of Speyer-on-Rhine, to see the new cathedral which has been in process of building for so many years, and is nearing completion. I was agreeably surprised to find it a most beautiful structure. The cathedral is about as large as Trinity Church, New York, although the steeple will be higher, reaching, when completed, an altitude of over three hundred feet. Everything seems to have been done, both as to exterior and interior, to make the cathedral a worthy memorial to Protestantism.

The photograph which I enclose, was taken in honor of my visit, and gives a pretty good idea of the present condition of the cathedral. The belfry tower had been started a few weeks before I arrived, which was June 20th, and the committee expected it to reach its height of about 200 feet this fall. The immense bell, "Kaiserglocke," donated by Emperor Wilhelm II, lay on the ground, ready to be hoisted in position as soon as the belfry is finished; it has a fine, rich, deep tone, pleasing to the ear, and can be heard for miles over the surrounding country.

Professor Guemle, the originator, and energetic spirit in this stupendous enterprise, was highly pleased to receive a representative of the Lutheran Church of America. He gave me a most royal welcome, and was untiring in his efforts to explain every detail of the splendid structure. He was disappointed in not being able to finish the cathedral this year, but adverse circumstances presented themselves which stopped the work for a short period. Two of the benefactors of the cathedral died this year, one of them, the late Henry Villard, who was a native of Speyer, and who had given most liberally toward the cathedral. Mr. Villard also founded a Lutheran Deaconess' Home (a grand monument to his memory) and a Manual Training School (Gewerbe Schule) for young men, in his native town. He certainly proved himself a worthy son of the city of his birth. Professor Guemle depended largely upon another liberal gift from him, but his sudden death cut it off. However, he was rejoiced to receive another subscription of ten thousand reichsmark the day of my visit, which greatly encouraged him.

The erection of this magnificent cathedral is another illustration of what one man can accomplish with a determined will, and implicit confidence in the ultimate success of the work. Professor Guemle possessed a childlike faith, and firmly believed that the Lord, in due time, would provide means to complete the cathedral. Many discouragements presented themselves during the years of patient labor, but appeals and courteous manner made many friends who obtained liberal contributions. Notably he enlisted Lutherans of this country in furnishing the statue of the central figure in the group of statues to be placed in the rotunda of the cathedral. This group represents six princes who made such vigorous protest in the Diet of Speyer, in the year 1529, which was generally considered the birth of Protestantism.

Protestants from all over the world made contribution toward this cathedral. The stained glass windows were all donated by ardent lovers of the Lutheran Church, and many are splendid works of art, principally illustrating the life of Christ. Some commemorate historic events of the Reformation—all are beautiful, and exceedingly interesting. I urged Professor Guemle to write a descriptive pamphlet or catalogue of all the articles donated, and put it among the donors. J. Pierpont Morgan donated the richly-carved, solid oak pulpit, most artistically executed and descriptive of a historic event of the Reformation.

All Protestantism may justly be proud of the near completion of this cathedral. Evidently no expense has been spared; the best material and the best workmanship have been employed to make it a lasting and enduring monument.

During my absence the subscriptions to the Luther Statue have almost ceased, just at a time when they are most needed. Professor Guemle made contact with Mr. H. Hahn, a well-known sculptor of Munich, and I am called upon to make the first payment of five thousand reichsmark (about $1,000). While the committee can meet the demand, another of like amount will soon be forthcoming, and it must be paid, because we have guaranteed the contract. It is hoped that the interest in this movement will be revived, and our long-minded Lutheran friends throughout the church at large will take up special collections in their churches or Sunday Schools, or make personal contributions. Almost a thousand copies of that beautiful, large photograph entitled "The Cathedral and his Family," are still on hand, and a copy of the same will be mailed gratis to every donor toward the Luther Statue Fund. All contributions will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

JAPAN COMING TO CHRIST

THOUSANDS CONVERTED IN A NATIONAL REVIVAL—A PENTECOSTAL WAVE SWEEPS THE GREAT CITIES

REV. MR. AKUNO
A prominent native Christian

AT the conference of missionaries held in Tokyo last October, a committee was appointed to co-operate with the Japanese pastors and evangelists in an effort to spread the Gospel throughout Japan. The movement met with almost universal approval, and arrangements were accordingly made for united evangelistic services in all parts of the country. The services in Tokyo were preceded by a daily union prayer meeting, which began on the 12th of May. It was at first attended by about 200 persons; but in the course of a week the number and interest had so greatly increased that only a part of the people could get inside of the church. Those who were outside knelt and prayed in the same way as those who were within. The Holy Spirit was manifestly present, and there was earnest crying unto God for his presence and blessing on the services which were to follow.

The meetings were at first confined to a single ward, and held in six different churches at the same time. The interest increased so rapidly that the services which followed were conducted in several wards. Placards were posted in conspicuous places, and banners carried through the streets; also hand-bills distributed everywhere, inviting the people to the meetings. Bands of students, and others, who were filled with the Spirit, went out on the street singing hymns and preaching to the passersby. Such a unity of spirit and readiness to work for the salvation of souls have never been seen in Japan before. At the end of June, the special meetings were temporarily discontinued. They are to be resumed again as soon as the hot season is ended.

Among many things that are of interest and importance we would mention the following:

1. The services were held in the churches, which were always thronged. Hitherto it has been found necessary to use the theatres or other public buildings, because those who were not Christians could not be induced to come to ordinary places of worship.

2. There was no attempt to make a disturbance, and the police took special pains to promote the success of the work.

3. While there was deep and very general interest there was no excitement or unseemly noise or demonstration of any kind.

4. The preaching was the simple, old, old story told in plain and earnest words, in reliance on the Holy Spirit alone to make it effectual. There has been an attempt hitherto on the part of some to formulate a Christianity expressly for Japan, but no one in these meetings sought to substitute any new or advanced scheme of salvation in place of the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ.

The results have been simply wonderful; such an awakening has never been known before in the history of Japan. The general expression of those who have seen and know of the work, is that it is certainly the hand of God, and that it is in answer to prayer. At a thanksgiving service held on the 6th of July, reports were made from fifty-one churches in the various districts. The total number of converts and inquirers was 5,307. This is the actual number of those who have their names publicly at the different gatherings. That all of these have been truly converted is not to be expected. From ten to twenty per cent. have once connected themselves with the churches, and others are being gathered in. Among these are men who have been criminals, drunkards, gamblers, and brothel-keepers, and such as are regarded as the most hopeless and abandoned. The spirit of God has taken possession of their hearts and they have truly been born again.

Not only has the criminal and degraded class been reached, but those in high station and wielding great influence have become new creatures in Christ, and are now working to bring others to Christ. Not only in Tokyo, but in Yokohama, Nagoya, Osaka, Nagasaki, Sendai and other cities there has been deep interest, and hundreds have been brought to Christ.

It is the purpose of those who have had this work in charge to continue in this same line, with still greater energy and courage, as soon as the hot season has passed and the weather will permit.

NATIVE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN TOKYO

THE FEAST of TABERNACLES

A Revival in a Reformed Jewish Synagogue of the Ancient Hebrew Ordinance

TEMPLE Ahavath Chesed ("Loving-kindness") on Lexington avenue and Fifty-fifth street, New York is one of the most influential Reformed Jewish congregations. Rabbi I. S. Moses, former of Chicago, in charge of the congregation, though imbued with the spirit of reform, yet suggested to his Board of Trustees recently the revival of the picturesque and ancient Feast of Succah ("booths"). The construction of this temporary habitation is described in Nehemiah 8: 16. With the aid of several ladies of the congregation, Rabbi Moses succeeded in erecting model succah. The structure is situated in the temple courtyard, while the fourth wall, at the entrance, consisted of thin boards, enveloped in drapery. The floor in the centre was overlaid with an immense, heavy silk rug. The roof was covered with evergreens, so arranged that the stars and stars were visible, in accordance with the rabbinical injunction, which symbolizes that lower frail our dwellings may be, we are always protected by our Creator. The interior decorations of the tabernacle were very attractive. The walls were covered with immaculate damask, upon which hung fanciful clusters of various domestic and tropical fruits, interwoven with American flags. Since the Tabernacle Feast also commemorates the "Ingathering Harvest," a large variety of plain and fancy vegetables were heaped on one side of the table. The large table in the centre bore varied fruits, arranged upon silver salvers several stories high. The chief attraction, however, was an enormously long hallah (twist of bread), over which a benediction was pronounced before it was broken.

It is safe to predict that this striking innovation by Temple Ahavath Chesed will be the forerunner of like changes in many other Hebrew Congregations.

A. BENJAMIN.

On the first night of the feast, after the service in the synagogue, the rabbi invited the congregation to the succah. The chief ceremony within the succah consists of kiddush (benediction over a cup of wine), and hamatzeh (benediction over bread), in which all the congregation then participated. The rabbi chose as assistants for the service the oldest members of the congregation. To any Christian observer, it would appear like a regular communion service, the only difference being that while the latter is characterized by solemnity and awe, the former commemorates "a season of rejoicing" (Deut. 16: 13-15), and the scene was one of joyfulness.

The benedictions pronounced in the Tabernacle were as follows: over the wine—"Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the universe, who createst the fruit of the vine"; over the bread—"Blessed . . . who bringest forth bread from the earth"; over the succah—"Blessed . . . who hath sanctified us by thy commandments, and hast commanded us to dwell in the Tabernacle." Also—"Blessed . . . who hast kept us in life, and hast preserved us, and enabled us to reach this season." Orthodox Jews, especially in Europe, eat and sleep in the succah for a whole week during the continuance of the Feast of Tabernacles.

DUCCAL PROGRESS THROUGH CANADA

THE tour of the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York across the continent was completed according to programme. The royal party reached Victoria, the "Garden City of the Pacific Coast," on October 2, in time for the Duke to open the annual fair there, after which they started eastward again, Toronto being the next city on the schedule of visitation. Toronto has been making ready for months. Among the preparations was the erection of one of the most magnificent structures distinguishing the city. The royal party passed under this or in any other country.

The progress of Canada's future rulers has been marked by continuous ovations not by any means limited to the cities. Along the route, people could be seen in little groups by the roadside or standing in the door of their parlours, waving greetings the royal pair passed on.

The welcome at Cawa, the Capital, was naturally the most notable of the various municipal receptions. At the station, the royal party were met by Governor-General Lord Minto, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Premier, and May Morris, the latter, like the Lord Mayor of London, "all splendid in a great gown of scarlet cloth richly furred, surmounted by a gold chain." Bands were playing merrily. School-children, citizens and soldiers were out in full force, and streets were festooned everywhere with banners and bannanets. At night, the illuminations were of exceptional beauty; the trees, in all directions, seemed "loaded with great gold fruit," because of being hung with big round orange-colored lanterns; and the House of Commons stood out against the sky like a lace-work of light. The unveiling of the late Queen's statue on Parliament Hill was the distinguishing feature of the Ottawa visit. Medals were conferred on veterans of the South African War, and, in some instances, the Victoria Cross was given. A magnificent set of furs was one of Ottawa's gifts to the Duchess. Toronto's school children have provided a toy set of Toronto's public buildings, with a plan of the city, for the royal children. In British Columbia the Coast Indians presented the Duchess with their most precious and venerable relic, the "Hat of the Chief."

Many very interesting incidents have marked the royal journey. One of these was when the Duchess, after pinning his medal on a blind soldier's breast, took his hand and said, with tears in her eyes: "When I go home I will tell my sister Mary, I had the pleasure of meeting you." Her sister, the Duchess of Teck, had known the youth and had spoken to her of him. The royal pair have shown lively interest in Canadian development and done much to endear themselves to the people.

The Abducted Missionary

IN all the long record of missionary experience, there is no more thrilling page than that which tells of the capture of Miss Ellen M. Stone and her companion and fellow-worker, Mrs. Tsilka, by bandits, in the wild mountain fastnesses on the Turko-Bulgarian border. Whether the abduction of the American missionary was accomplished solely for the purpose of securing a ransom, or had ulterior political motives, as some of the cable despatches have suggested, will hardly be considered at the present moment.

What has absorbed the attention and excited the indignation and horror of the civilized world is the fact that in a supposedly peaceful district of southern Europe, a Christian woman, who had been spending the summer in those mountains, teaching and doing good, should be rudely seized and carried off to some remote hiding-place. Such deeds were probably not infrequent in mediæval times, but they are not now to be tolerated, and the government whose laxity makes them possible must be made to bear the full responsibility.

Although the American Board has expressed the conviction that Miss Stone's life is not in imminent danger, and that no violence need be apprehended, the State Department in Washington takes a different view of the case. Indeed, it has not hesitated to declare unofficially, that in all probability, the threat of the brigands, to sacrifice their captive, will be carried out, unless the ransom demanded is fully and promptly paid. Such a tragic sequel, however painful to contemplate, would only be a repetition of similar atrocities which have been perpetrated by brigands in other southern European countries in recent years. Italy and Greece have notoriously failed to make traveling safe within certain parts of their respective borders.

In the present case, it is likely that the stories of the fabulous wealth and generosity of Americans having penetrated to those Macedonian mountains, the cupidity of the lawless element was aroused and the crime was planned solely for plunder. The American Board has declined to accede to the demand for a ransom, on the ground that if the Board yields to such a demand, it would be placing a premium on brigandage, endangering missionaries everywhere, causing infinite pain and anxiety to friends at home, seriously embarrassing the missionary work, and jeopardizing the results of long years of consecrated toil.

To pay the ransom, therefore, would be to establish a dangerous precedent. At the same time, the natural solicitude of relatives and the sympathy of an interested public in Miss Stone's case have been so pronounced, that the Board has sent out an appeal in their behalf, inviting the whole nation to contribute the ransom and to share in the work of rescue.

Whatever the result of these efforts, the Government will doubtless insist on a full reckoning with Turkey and Bulgaria for this outrage, and it will be the subject of diplomatic correspondence for months to come. It is to be hoped that the deplorable experience of Miss Stone and her companions may give rise to a vigorous movement for the suppression of brigandage and the punishment of the outlaws, which will result in benefit to travelers and sojourners in foreign lands generally, and to none more than to the missionaries themselves.

Episcopalians on Divorce

GREATER interest than ordinarily is excited by a religious assemblage is aroused in the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, now in session in San Francisco. Several questions of vital importance to that Church are being considered by the high dignitaries and other delegates there assembled, such as the new name proposed for the Church, and the various questions arising out of ritualistic tendencies, which some of the clergy have developed. But the interest of the general religious public is not concerned so much with these matters, which are of internal concern, as with the legislation which the Convention has been asked to enact in connection with marriage and divorce. Not that the Convention can interfere with the courts, or can impose restrictions on the freedom of divorce, but it can prohibit the clergy of the Church giving its sanction to unions which it does not approve.

The legislation proposed is twofold. One of the new canons suggested, forbids a clergyman to solemnize a marriage when either of the parties to it has a husband or wife still living, unless such person has obtained a divorce in "a court of competent jurisdiction for cause existing before such marriage." Thus, if this canon is adopted, although the Church will not condemn divorce, it practically condemns both the wrongdoer and the innocent victim to remain unmarried so long as the other lives. It is possible that either may go to a clergyman of some other Church or to a civil officer, and be legally married, but neither can have the sanction of the Protestant Episcopal Church on the union, nor must a clergyman of that Church perform the marriage ceremony. The second canon provides the penalty for offending members of the Church. Persons so divorced and married again, are excluded from baptism, confirmation and communion, in other words, excommunicated, except in the case of "the innocent party to a divorce for the cause of adultery."

The direct effect of such legislation, if it is adopted, may be relatively small, but its indirect influence will probably be extensive. The attitude it implies is logical and dignified. It does not interfere with personal liberty, but it declines to sanction by its benediction unions of which it does not approve. So the Church will preserve itself from complicity in the laxity now all too prevalent in this matter, and apply such deterrents as are within its power to its own members. To what extent its example will be followed by other religious bodies, time will show. We can imagine the consternation that would be caused by all denominations taking the same position. If every person contemplating obtaining a divorce, with the usual sequence of another marriage, knew that the ceremony would be unblest by the Church, not a few would hesitate to incur the odium. It is probable, however, that the influence of the Convention will consist chiefly in its characterization of such marriages. That the bishops and clergy should condemn them, implies that in their opinion they are offensive in the divine eyes, and that fact will weigh with God-fearing people. There will inevitably be a difference of opinion among theologians on the subject, but the decision by so learned and pious a body as the Convention will certainly have its effect.

It would be well if such action as the Convention may take, should not only influence other denominations, but give stimulus to the movement for securing a uniform divorce law for the whole country. The present anomalous situation of the courts of one State granting a divorce which is not recognized in another, and a marriage which is valid in one State being regarded as illicit in another, is intolerable. Legislation so stringent as that which the Convention is asked to adopt, could not be enacted in any State Capital, nor perhaps would so stringent a law be desirable; but if the religious bodies, with some approach to uniformity, made a definite statement of their views, public opinion would surely be affected. Then there would be some hope that if a model divorce law were prepared, eliminating the worst of the present abuses, the State Legislatures might adopt it, and so the evil that is sapping the foundations of our social purity would be remedied.

Fishing for Gudgeons

FISHERMEN tell us there are certain specimens of the finny tribes that are extremely wary and hard to hook. They look all around the bait before they venture a nibble, and they disdain to rise at a fly. Then there are "fool" fish, that jump at and swallow any kind of lure, the moment the hook strikes water. Nothing that swims is so easily caught as these gudgeons; yet hardly more easily than the shoals of human gudgeons, who are attracted by the golden bait thrown out by speculators, and by that alert class of fishermen who are always angling for the pocketbooks of the credulous.

This is an age of exploitation and adventure, of good and bad enterprises, of genuine and bogus investment. It is a peculiarity of many schemes that they appeal to the cupidity of the man or woman who, by industry and thrift, has saved a little money and put it by for a rainy day. They want, not thousands nor hundreds, but the dollars and the dimes. In printed words that glow, they describe the attractions of their particular project, and demonstrate, to a mathematical certainty, how it must pay unheard-of dividends. Buy stock, the concern, and you will get every dollar back in a year, and own your stock besides. It is just like a fortune, for with your holdings doubled every month, you can already reckon yourself on the highway to millionairehood. Ten shares will yield you a sufficient income for life, twenty will make you positively rich, a hundred will give you a place among the nabobs. If you are credulous, and dazzled by the glittering temptation, you mail your check, get a dividend or two, paid out of your own money, and then—your tire concern explodes, being either raided by the authorities or flung into the hands of a receiver, leaving you, with thousands of other gudgeons, prettily hooked.

There is an old-fashioned rhyme, which it would be well to recall whenever any one tempts you with the offer of sudden wealth:

If a friend has a scheme which he shows very clear,
Will net you a full twenty thousand a year,
Tho' it seems like a fortune to others' hands thrum,
Take counsel from caution and—let it alone!

Many people write to us inquiring as to the stability of certain investments. Let them remember that really substantial enterprises are not financed on the gudgeon fishing plan; that reputable business undertakings do not need to be hawked about, in order to attract capital. Distrust any scheme which promises ten, fifteen, twenty per cent. returns. Investigate, and you will generally find it "wild-cat," or "crook"—in other words, a humbug, devised to empty your pocket book or deplete your savings account. Safe investments yield only moderate returns. The wise man is contented with reasonable increase; the fool chases for more and loses all.

Irritating Days

THERE are times when everything seems so generally wrong. From seven o'clock A.M. till tea-time, affairs are in a twist. You rise in the morning and the room is cold, and a button is off and the breakfast is tough, and the stove smokes and the pipes burn, and you start down the street nettled from head to foot. All day long things are adverse. Insinuation, petty losses, meanness on the part of customers. The ink-bottle upsets and spoils the carpet. Some one gives a wrong turn to the damper and the gas escapes. An agent comes in determined to insure your life when it is already insured for more than it is worth, and you are afraid some one will knock you on the head before the price of your policy; but he sticks to you, showing you pictures of Old Time and the hour-glass and death's scythe and a skeleton, making it quite certain that you will die before your time, unless you take out papers in his company. Beside this, you have cold in your head, and a grain of dirt in your eye, and you are a walking uneasiness. The day is out of joint, and no surgeon can set it.

The probability is that if you would look at the weather-vane, you would find that the wind is from the east, and you might remember that you have lost much sleep lately. It might happen to be that you are out of joint instead of the day. Be careful and do not write many letters while you are in that irritated mood. You will pen some things that you will be sorry for afterward.

Let us remember that these spiked nettles of life are part of our discipline. Life would get nauseating if it were all honey. That table would be poorly set that had on it nothing but treacle. We need a little vinegar, mustard, pepper, and horseradish, that bring the tears even when we do not feel pathetic. If this world were all smoothness, we would never be ready for emulation to a higher and better. This world is a poor hiding-post. Instead of tying fast on the cold mountain, we had better whip up and hasten on toward the way where our good friends are looking out of the window watching to see us come up.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Millenary of a King

WORTHY of special notice is the celebration which has just taken place in England of the thousandth anniversary of the death of King Alfred. It is doubtful whether any other king has been, or will be, so honored. That a man should be so impressed himself on the nation, that a thousand years after his death the people should have united to commemorate his reign implies unusual greatness. A great deal of myth and romance has gathered about Alfred's personality, but sufficient well-established facts are known to account for the celebration. He was, first of all, a military hero. It was no small achievement, with means at his disposal, to drive out of his country the Danish invaders, in spite of their superior arms and better discipline. Defeated time and again, he never yielded to despair, even when all his followers had lost hope. Struggling valorously, fighting with his own hands at the head of his army, Alfred at last wrested victory from his foes. Then, he was an able administrator. His code of laws showed singular ability and a judicial mind, and he took care that they were impartially executed. He created a fleet, although it was necessary at first to fight it with foreigners, he saw to it that his own people should learn the art of seamanship. He was also a pioneer in education. Not only did he instruct learned foreigners to his country, but with his own hand prepared text-books, translating some from foreign tongues and writing others. His schools he established were numerous and efficient, and these not only for the children of the nobles, but for the children of the common people. The era of Alfred was consequently a beginning of the English nation. The celebration of his millenary consisted in the unveiling of an heroic statue of the king in his own city of Winchester, an imposing gathering of eminent men, who went in procession to his grave and other sites identified with his life, and in the inspection of the Round Table and other relics of his reign, which are carefully preserved in the national museums. Lectures and eulogistic addresses by famous orators concluded the ceremonies. The celebration shows how true were the words of the Psalmist: "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance (Ps. 106: 6).

That was merely a coincidence. Still, it may have cost the man his life, as it confused the diagnosis." Ministers and Christian workers who deal with spiritual maladies cannot be misled in that way. They know that always the heart is turned from God, and until it is turned to him, there is no hope of recovery.

Mine heart is turned within me for I have grievously rebelled (Lam. 1: 20).

Cost of Prolonging a Life

A curious suit is before the Orphans' Court of Pittsburg, Pa. An eminent physician recently sent a bill to the executors of a wealthy man, for upwards of five thousand dollars. As the medical services charged for in the bill were rendered during a comparatively short period, the executors refused to pay so large a sum, and suit has been brought for the amount. In explanation, the physician states that about one-half the indebtedness was incurred during the last month of the patient's life, when he devoted all his time to him. He believes that he actually kept him alive by his skill for that month, and he considered that one hundred dollars for every day that he enabled the man to live was not an unreasonable compensation. In confirmation of his contention, he near the mouth of the river Zaldas, to visit some friends who have a farm in that vicinity. He missed his way and came out on the river bank. As he sat on his horse, hesitating which way to take, his hat blew off and rolled into the river. As he saw it floating near the bank, he alighted and went to the edge of the stream to recover it. Instantly he became aware that he was on a quicksand and was fast sinking. He had heard of the quicksand from a man who had discovered a way of extracting the gold from it. So rich was it in the precious metal that it yielded twelve hundred dollars to the ton. As he was sinking so rapidly, the thought of the value of the sand crossed his mind, but did not improve the situation. It was no consolation to him that it was gold that threatened to smother him. He shouted with all his might, and soon a man with a lariat came to his help. It seemed as if the rope would cut him in two, but at last he was drawn out and thankfully stood on solid ground. It was fortunate for him that some one was at hand to draw him out of the golden sand, for if he had been left to himself he would have lost his life. How many there are among the gold in other places who are in far greater danger. They are in peril of losing their souls in its treacherous toils!

train went around a good part of the State of Georgia. Macon is in the geographical centre of the State. The run to Dublin carried the train to the east of Macon; thence it went back to its stopping place, then south almost to the coast, and then west and north to Atlanta, passing through more than two-thirds the length of the State, and finally turned south for a good quarter of the State's length before it reached its destination. The longest way round proved the shortest way home. The railroad officials must have felt proud when they brought their passengers safe into Macon. Probably in no other country in the world would there have been such persistency in trying to overcome an obstacle. Would that there was always the same indomitable energy in striving to enter the kingdom of God so that Christ's words might be fulfilled:

The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force (Matt. 11: 12).

An Heiress Dead in a Poorhouse

A firm of New York bankers made a pathetic discovery at Wilkesbarre, Pa., last week. Seven years ago they became administrators of the estate of a citizen of Brooklyn, N. Y., who had died without making a will. The estate proved to be worth forty thousand dollars, and it was soon found that the nearest of kin was the sister of the deceased. Efforts were made to trace her, but were unsuccessful, until a clue led them to Wilkesbarre. There they learned that the woman of whom they were in search died last November in the poorhouse. In early life she had married a physician of Wilkesbarre, who died thirty years ago. She soon fell into indigent circumstances, and had to work hard to support herself. Seven years ago she had an illness, which incapacitated her for labor, and she was committed to the poorhouse. There she lived until her death, never knowing of the search that was being made for her, nor that a fortune awaited her claiming it. If she had known, how eagerly she would have applied for her inheritance! She would not have needed the urging that has to be used to induce people to seek the heavenly inheritance which they might have through Christ.

An inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you (1. Peter 1: 4).

BRIEF NOTES

Our part in the great work of civilization of Africa is of a mixed character. We have sent many missionaries there, and two weeks ago a vessel sailed from Boston, Mass., for west Africa with a cargo of rum and other intoxicating spirits, valued at $110,000.

One hundred girls from Dr. Barnardo's Homes have just been sent to Canada, and 300 boys went out a few weeks ago. It is proposed to send 400 more young emigrants of both sexes before October. Canada is now the home of some 12,000 of these waifs. Exceptional success has attended them, only 15 per 1,000 have failed to make their way.

The employees in stores in several French towns have issued an appeal to the public, asking the people to make no purchases on Sunday. The response has been so general that the tradesmen find it is useless to keep their stores open, and have agreed to close them on the Lord's day. A similar movement is beginning in several districts of Paris.

What one earnest Christian may do is seen in an incident communicated to the Congregationalist. A lady noticed a gang of fifty Italian laborers at work near her home. She saw that they never went to church on Sunday, though there was a Roman Catholic Church near. She bought fifty Italian Testaments and gave one to each man. Soon afterwards one of their number, who could speak English, went to her and asked if there was any place where they could go to hear that book explained. She sent to the nearest city for a minister who could preach in Italian. He came, and has now begun a work that promises good results.

A Anatomical Freak

A remarkable discovery was made a few days ago at an autopsy. A patient in the City Hospital at St. Louis, Mo., was suffering from a disease which had all the symptoms of appendicitis, except that the pain and the inflammation were on the left side of the body, while the appendix is on the right. After the patient's death it was found by a post-mortem examination that not only was the appendix transposed, but the heart was on the right side instead of the left. The right lung, with its three lobes, was on the left side and the left lung, with its two lobes, was on the right side. The stomach was on the right side instead of the left. The liver was on the left side instead of the right, and the spleen was on the right side instead of the left. "I never saw such a case before," said the operator, "though a few are recorded. I do not think that the transposition of the organs has any connection with the appendicitis.

showed that during that time the patient had been able, by certain transactions, to add a million dollars to his fortune. If the physician had dealt with the millionaire himself, instead of with his executors, he would probably have had no difficulty in getting a great deal more than a hundred dollars a day for the prolongation of his life. Men seldom consider money when life and death are in the balance, though they neglect to secure eternal life, which might be had without money and without price.

Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely (Rev. 22: 17).

Sinking in Gold

A visitor to Denver, Col., who has been spending some years in New Zealand, tells a remarkable story of an experience he had shortly before sailing for the United States. He went to a district

God alone can deliver them from its enslaving and benumbing power.

The care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful (Matt. 13: 22).

A Circuitous Journey

A press despatch from Macon, Ga., reports the arrival there of a train which had made a long journey to reach its destination. When it was within thirty-five miles of Macon, a washout was discovered which barred further progress. Orders were sent to it to take another route which would bring it around by way of Dublin, but on the way another washout was found. A run was then made to Helena, but a third washout prevented the train reaching Columbus. Finally it went to Jesup, thence to Montgomery and Atlanta, and at last reached Macon, forty-two hours behind time. To avoid the washout the

Occupations for Women—VIII

Secretary, Companion, Mother's Assistant

AMONG the purely domestic occupations which invite the attention of refined women the three which I have grouped together take a high place. Many women of wealth, with the numerous obligations laid upon them by society, in these rushing days, require the services of a private secretary. Such a young lady must have a very complete equipment for her post. A good education, particularly in English, is indispensable, and acquaintance with French is, in New York, frequently insisted upon by an employer. German, too, would not come amiss. The uncertain, sprawling, untidy handwriting, affected by many young women, would not be tolerated in a secretary. She must write a clear, legible and neat hand, all the better if it be characteristic. She must know how to compose a good letter, to express herself gracefully yet concisely, and she must be systematic, good-tempered and prompt. During the season of fashionable entertainments in large cities, it is not unusual for a young woman to have several employers, to whom she goes at fixed hours, addressing invitations for them, replying to their correspondence, and receiving her payment at a stipulated sum per hour.

Sometimes a literary man, who has on hand some large undertaking in the line of bookwriting—a compilation or a history, perhaps—requires the aid of a clever woman in looking up references, verifying dates, and making indexes, as well as in copying his work on the typewriter. For copying, in long hand, there is no demand at present. A private secretary to be useful to an author, or to a man of business, or a statesman, should be a stenographer, able to take dictation swiftly, and a very accurate operator on the typewriter. Nobody is fit to be a secretary who has not a high sense of honor, and who cannot be relied on to keep silence as to her employer's business, the work being confidential.

Companion

An invalid gentlewoman, an elderly lady living alone, a lady about to travel, or a lady whose husband and children are obliged to be much away from home, may need a companion. The position is thoroughly respectable, but has certain difficulties peculiar to itself. The companion is not a lady's maid, and is not supposed to undertake the work of a domestic, yet she renders inevitably, in an obliging construction of her office, a good deal of personal service. She must be ready to efface herself on many occasions; in popular parlance, she must play second fiddle. In traveling, she bears the brunt of the disagreeable, and saves her employer annoyance. At home she undertakes a hundred small commissions, drives or walks to a station to meet an arriving guest, and speeds the departure of the visitor who leaves by an inconveniently early morning train. She acts as a buffer between the servants and their mistress, and, if she have a talent for singing, playing, reading aloud, soothing a headache, or charming away a mood of melancholy, she uses it at every proper occasion. Her amiability and cheerfulness are forever on tap, and, for all this subtle, intangible generosity of ministry, she receives a comfortable home as one of the family, and, from fifteen to twenty dollars per month, as a usual honorarium.

Mother's Assistant

Since mothers' congresses, clubs, and conventions have done their good work in calling mothers to study the individual peculiarities of their children, and to adapt to each child the means best suited to its character, hundreds of women have become unwilling to entrust an ignorant nursemaid with the care of their little ones. Mothers understand the great importance of the first precious years. They are awake to the fact that early impressions are the most enduring. So, it has gradually come to pass that young women of culture and fine education, fresh from high-school or from college, find waiting for them in refined households the place of an elder daughter, or a youthful aunt; the place to the mother of a kinswoman, who has general charge of the nursery, and a great deal of undisputed though delegated authority there; who is a nurse to the little ones just as their mother is, and is, as well, their teacher, playmate, and friend. This avocation is a pleasant one to a child-loving young woman, and her value in it is tripled, if she have taken a course in kindergarten. She should be a sincere Christian, for she influences childhood vitally in the freshness of its morning.

Domestic Pets

When children have pets, whether the common lovable house cat and dog, or something else that requires care, a parrot, a monkey, or a canary, they should never be allowed to treat them with neglect. Food and water should be regularly provided. The pets should be kept clean, and should have a warm bed at night. A child who forgets to care for an animal that belongs to him will be otherwise irresponsible in after life.

Simple Directness in Prayer

DO you ever think how much we miss by being involved in our prayers, how much we would gain by simplicity and directness? We are anxious about Gerald, who is ill with a run of slow fever, all maladies the most wearing on the victim and the most discouraging to friends and care-takers. We feel down to pray, and we say, "Oh, Lord, bless thy young servant, who is so weary and sick," and this is all right, but it would be shorter to say, "Bless Gerald." The Lord knows every one of our names. Has he not said, "I have called thee by thy name. Thou art mine." Yes, not the Shepherd call each sheep by name? Let us be very direct, very definite in our prayers, believing that

Wherever he may guide me
No want shall turn me back
My Shepherd is beside me,
And nothing can I lack.
His wisdom ever waketh,
His sight is never dim,
He knows the way he taketh,
And I will walk with him.

Enjoying a Feast

These jolly little fellows may be invited to fine banquets when they are in manhood, and even while they are children they may sit down at bountifully spread tables, but they will never get anything in their lives much better than the hot potatoes they have baked for themselves in the ashes. "I tell you, it's fine," says Tim to Mark, and the merry chaps bubble over with laughter and fun as they eat their little feast. Indeed, I don't know that the veriest epicure in the land ever partakes of a viand more delicious than a nicely potato, baked in its jacket, and seasoned with a little salt, and an appetite sharpened by a brisk walk on an autumn day. We might flaunt our defiance at dyspepsia and its tortures, if we could be contented with such simple fare.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—LOIS. Your mother is wise. A school-girl should not go to parties.
—JEAN. To spell badly is a disgrace. Overcome the fault by study of the dictionary.
—FRIEND F. Your letter was so wise that I could not understand your point. Write again.
—DRESSMAKER. If you do your best, don't worry over disagreeable customers. Worry kills more than work does.
—WANDERING WILLIE. Do you think it kind to keep your mother in ignorance of your whereabouts? I think it unkind.
—G. K. G. Many very happy marriages occur in which the wife is a few years older of the two. There is no rule about it.
—MRS. J. W. A. The dear child has a loving heart, and it has room for a good many friends. I think she loves mother best.
—MARGUERITE. Your husband is fond of petting, not fault-finding. Men are only boys—most of them. You are too exacting.
—TEACHER. A person may teach well, and dislike the profession, if she is very faithful and conscientious, yet the best teachers love their work.

—CYNIC. The world is not growing worse, but the telegraph and printing-press spread out its wickedness before us every day. I really think it is steadily growing better.

—CHRISTINE. If you care for your friend, write to him once. In a few months it may be too late. Why did you not unbend when he tried to show that he was sorry for the past?

—S. C. F. Prayer and pains will set free the daughter whom you speak, especially now that her father is no longer with her. The second trial, very vaguely described, must be endured. Write to the secretary of Home Missions of your denomination, state your third problem, and await his reply.

—SISTER'S LITTLE HELPER. Have two pans for your dishes, one of clear, hot water to rinse them in after washing with soap. Dip each piece by itself, and dry quickly on clean towels. Pile plates, saucers, cups, etc., by themselves. Take glass and silver first.

Aunt Jean

"Not to be ministered unto but to minister"

BY
Edith Ferguson Black.

DOOR child! her life was proof enough that earth's choicest things cannot be bought with gold, and yet people, in spite of the knowledge, will give their lives for it with the zeal of a Livingstone. High-ho! what a world of misery it is. If I could only wake up with Bellamy to find it but a dream." She held up her hand, while a mournfully sweet smile lit her fine face. The firelight danced on the broad band of gold which she wore constantly upon her third finger; the diamonds which were sunk in its surface flashed and sparkled, few, but she noted that one of their number was missing. "Poor tired Helen! What could she have done in her life to make her dwell so constantly on the idea of reparation?"

Attached to her watch-chain was a key, the case which she carried always with her. She lifted it curiously. "What if she had in me, poor child, to expect me to promise on such conditions. I am anxious to know her history; but of course I never shall, even though I hold a little key, in my very fingers. Just give you one turn in yonder lock—ah, no, then, your faith in me at least shall not be shattered, though I meet you at last on the shores of Eternity with the secrets between us." She shut her eyes and could almost fancy she heard the voice of the dying girl pleading.

Promise me, darling, you will wear it ring always, and not till the missing jewel is replaced, attempt to read my secret. When the missing link is added to the severed chain, you will judge me more mercifully."

What made her dwell so much on Helen? It was to-day? Many experiences had come to her since she had closed that sad chapter of her nursing life—fevers and stillpox, broken limbs, and all the thousand-and-one horrors of hospital life had kept her busy, in spite of the doctor's protests and Helen's pleadings that she would give up work and live on the handsome annuity she bequeathed to her. "My dear, I must work while I can," she had answered. The money she accepted gladly, and spent it all, as Helen's alms-giving among the poor.

A servant came to the door with a yellow envelope. She knew its import. It was from Dr. Holinstein, and contained a few brief words:

Report for duty at Central Station in time for 5.45 train east. Escort will meet you at Oskaloosa Junction and drive you to destination. Case of deferred convalescence. HOLINSTEIN.

"A Happy Christmas."

Jean passed a thin hand across her forehead. It could not, must not be, that she was breaking down! She rose determinedly, though every nerve quivered, and began her simple preparations. She never thought to wonder who or where the people were, it made so little difference.

CHAPTER II.

THE close of a long drive the carriage drew up before an old-fashioned country house, and Aunt Jean was ushered into a large, low room, whose deep-set windows and heavily-studded ceiling filled her æsthetic soul with delight. Sinking into a roomy arm-chair, she waited to be summoned to her patient. A soft, spicy fragrance filled the air, a reminding her of Muriel Hazelton. A sense of loneliness caught and held her heart as in a vise, and she shut her eyes to keep back unwelcome tears. Suddenly she was blindedfolded by soft hands, while a voice strangely familiar, exclaimed joyfully:

"Caught at last! Oh, you dear old Aunt Jean, how splendidly we've trapped you! You can't get away from us again."

He looked up bewildered, to see Muriel herself, radiant with happy color.

"But, my patient?"

"You shall see her presently; but you've got to let me have twenty minutes, standing here, to feast my aching eyes on you."

She led her at last up the broad staircase into a room filled with breath of flowers and delicious aroma of spruce, while in delicate sprays of holly she read her welcome.

"Now, behold your patient!"

Jean looked round curiously. The luxurious bed had never been touched, a low couch was drawn beside an open fireplace, but it, too, was empty. Muriel led her in front of a long mirror, "There, you dear old goose; look in and see if Dr. Holinstein didn't do well to call it 'deferred convalescence?'" Wonderingly Jean obeyed, and noted with surprise how thin and worn her face had grown. Slowly the truth dawned upon her, and with a cry that was almost a sob, she turned and caught Muriel to her heart.

very sweet, and in her weariness really welcome. She brightened under it, and, as they told her, seemed almost as cheerful in the family party as if she was with a patient.

A lovely day was drawing its mantle of evening about it as the family assembled in the cheery sitting-room. Jean was surrounded by the little Hazeltons, who were listening eagerly to a vivacious description of some of her hospital experiences. The rest and change had brought new color to her cheek, and a new sparkle to her expressive eyes.

"Isn't she beautiful!" whispered Muriel, as she nestled up to her father. "It's no wonder the boys call her the 'Duchess,' and yet, after all she's gone through, she is as brimful of fun as the rest of us."

"A DEEP VOICE NEAR HER STARTLED HER."

"You see," ran on that lady, after she had got Jean comfortably arranged on the couch, "it seemed so hopelessly impossible to get hold of you, that mamma decided you had not properly fulfilled your contract and that my system really needed extra nursing. I knew asking you would be no use; I had tried that till I was weary of my life because of these 'daughters of Heth,' so we decided to come down to stay a few weeks with Uncle Joe, so that you couldn't possibly suspect anything till we had you fairly in our power. Oh, it's delicious; and that dear old Dr. Holinstein did manage it so beautifully."

"How the child does talk," said Mrs. Hazelton, looking with proud delight at her fair young daughter. "Haden't you better let Jean be quiet now, dear? It is nearly time for dinner, and the rest of us want to enjoy her a little."

"Not at all, my patient is far too weary for any excitement. We will have dinner cozily together up here, and then have a lovely evening examining our thoughts by firelight. It is bad enough to have to share her with the rest of you tomorrow."

Aunt Jean for once had to give up her usual role of the ministering angel and submit to be ministered unto. It was Then she sprang up with a cry of delight: "Uncle Guy!"

All looked towards the open door and ran to welcome the stranger; Jean, ashy pale, rose tremblingly, and fled like a hunted deer to her room. When she appeared again, it was in her regulation dress for hospital duty, and a keen observer would have noticed she was holding herself in rigid self-control.

"It was cruel of you," cried Muriel, tears of disappointment in her eyes. "I wanted Uncle Guy, of all people, to see you at your best."

"Hush, ma belle;" and Jean laid soft fingers on the rosy lips, "I needed to make myself remember that I must get me back to work."

Later in the evening Jean was standing in the deep bay window, her aching head against the casement, while, with tight-clasped hands, she strove to still the throbbings of her heart. Outside, the moon shone brilliantly and flooded the waiting earth with glory as it lay expectant in its robes of white. A deep voice near her startled her. "Am I to have no share," it asked, "in the peace and goodwill that you give to the sick and suffering?" Just as he spoke a sound of music came from the children's room, where the young voices were singing their evening hymn. He waited patiently, looking with hungry eyes at the pale, proud face.

"Mr. Hazelton has surely little need to crave good-will when all men give it him; the peace must come from God."

"The peace I need just now must come through one of his angels."

"Then I will pray him to send it you to-night."

He leaned forward eagerly. "Will you, do you, pray for me? Oh! Miss Ritter—Jean—"

Her lips quivered; one swift glance at the handsome face so near her, then her eyes sought the sky, and her voice was stilled into the passionlessness of repressed feeling: "I pray for the world."

He shrank back, his lips working painfully under his heavy moustache. "At least let me give you this, and so fulfil a dying legacy and a living trust. I had hoped you would let the ring carry a double significance."

He handed her a tiny packet, then, with a generous desire to shield her from observation, went back into the room.

Safe in the shelter of her own room Jean opened the box with trembling hands. There, on a velvet cushion, reposed the missing diamond, bearing on its sparkling bosom the single letter "J." Far into the night she sat absorbed. The time had come at last to read Helen's secret.

"You did not know, darling," the story ran; "how should you? that I was Guy's cousin and lover, long before he became yours. So good he was, so brave and true; I believe I fell in love with him in my cradle; and he was so gentle with me! Always delicate, I was pampered in every wish, and it was a very exacting tyrant he had to please. I need not tell you he did please me in everything, though he, of all my subjects, absolutely refused to compromise either principle or duty. How I loved him! I should have gloried to lay me down beneath his feet, and he, in his grand simplicity, never dreamt of anything but cousinly affection! I knew I was nothing to him, but I loved on; there was always the hope that I might be some time. At last I found out he did love another, and that hope died; from that day I experienced the miseries of the nether world. He always stayed with us when he was in —, and I used to torture myself watching the light in his face as he sat near me in the evenings, thinking of you! I hated you—remember, darling, I never knew you, and forgive."

"One day he spoke to me of you—how loyal he was! It seemed as if he could not bear to mention your name except to his own heart, and I—fainted away at his feet—and still he did not see!"

"At last one day he came to me in great distress. He was just on the eve of departure to plight you to him forever, when he received a cable that his father was dying in England, and it was imperative he should sail at once. There wasn't a moment to lose, he had dashed off a letter to you, and he handed it to me with a package, asking me, for his sake, to get them to you,—he knew no safer way! Oh, Guy, my darling! The very spirits of evil took possession of me from that moment,—my dear, will you be able to forgive me,—in my grave?"

"I opened the package. I had everything in my power. Guy had sailed,—I had been the last to wave him farewell from the pier, while my heart was weeping tears of blood. There lay the ring—your ring—to circle your finger constantly with messages from him. The sight maddened me,—darling, sometimes I feel as if it was too much to expect you to forgive—I opened the letter, and read the tender, passionate words, that no eye but yours was ever meant to see!"

"Sometimes I think the very prince of evil delights to make his throne in human hearts. In a very fit of frenzy I dashed out your name at the top of the letter and substituted my own, then read it over and over until every word was stamped on my

"FORGIVE AS WE FORGIVE" *

JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCTOBER 27TH.
GENESIS 45: 1-15

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT:--ROM. 12: 21:
"BE NOT OVERCOME OF EVIL, BUT OVERCOME EVIL WITH GOOD"

OBELISK AT HELIOPOLIS

WHEN we pray, "Forgive as we forgive," many of us thoughtlessly ask God not to forgive us. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift" (Matt. 5: 23, 24). In these words Christ requires that we forgive before we are forgiven. Shall God or a grudge occupy our hearts? They can no more dwell together than light and darkness. What if God should say to you, as you have said to someone who has done you a real or fancied wrong, "I can forgive anything but that?" If anyone was ever justified in saying so, it was the man who in the lesson of to-day showed how much nobler is forgiveness than revenge. "To err is human, to forgive divine." It was not an element of weakness but largeness of heart that made President McKinley say of his assassin, in the very moment after he was shot, as bystanders seized him, "Don't let any one hurt him." He was solicitous, lest there should be some lawless revenge to the dishonor of his country, and free even in that first moment of pain and shock, as he was to the last, from any personal feeling against his murderer, in the spirit of him who said, while his crucifiers nailed him to the cross, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

The Lesson Story

"Revenge is sweet." Is it? The story of Joseph dealing with his brethren shows us that forgiveness is sweet indeed, while revenge is only bitter-sweet, reversed, sweet first, perhaps, but certainly bitter in the end. When Joseph had been sold by his brethren, can we think of him crying out, "I will pay you back some day for your meanness!" If he had made such a threat, what an opportunity came to him for doing it! Exalted to be the ruler of all Egypt, and of such unlimited power that Pharaoh had said to him: "Without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt," he could have done what he pleased with those brethren of his when they came into his presence. They were helpless before him, having come at least two hundred and fifty miles to buy food. Joseph could have refused them food, and they would soon have been dead men, and their families would have died as well. Joseph might have had revenge a hundred-fold! But Joseph had set no trap for his brethren. They came only because of their necessity. Joseph had not seen them, nor probably heard of them for the space of twenty-one years. But he recognized them at once. They had changed very little in appearance, for they were grown men when he last saw them, and they had kept on with the same occupation as shepherds. On the other hand, they did not recognize Joseph, because he had grown from boyhood to manhood, and was to all appearances an Egyptian, and was called by an Egyptian name, "Zaphnath-Paaneah." No disguise could have been more complete. Joseph could have swooped down upon those brothers of his with a revenge so full as to glut his soul. But instead, he chose to enfold them with love and forgiveness.

He first tested them in several ways. He had them kept in prison for three days that he might get a close view of their characters. He held Simeon as an hostage until the others should go and bring back Benjamin, that he might know if their hearts were kind toward their brother. He had the money which they had paid for food put into their sacks to test whether or not they loved money as much as they did when they sold him for the price of a slave. He further tested their feeling for their brother Benjamin by ordering his valuable silver cup to be placed in Benjamin's sack, and sending out a search warrant for it. Joseph did none of these things out of revenge, but rather that he might know if it would be wise for him to forgive them. And how did the brothers stand the test? Simeon willingly remained in prison until Benjamin was brought. The money was returned each time it was put in the sacks. And when the silver cup was found in Benjamin's sack there was such sorrow that all of the brothers returned to the great ruler of Egypt to plead his innocence at the risk of their own lives, and for the sake of the old father, whom they now wished to comfort, rather than deceive, as they had once done.

Would revenge have been "sweet" then? The joy of forgiveness was greater. So great was it, that the heart of Joseph was thrilled by it. He could not but shed tears, glad tears. It was too sweet for aliens to gaze upon, and so he ordered that he should be left alone with those whom he was soon to call "brethren." And when he said to them, "I am Joseph whom ye sold into Egypt," and saw the consternation of his brothers, who expected only revenge, he endeavored to quiet their fears and to reassure them. He even told them that in God's own providence he had been sent into Egypt. God had, indeed, brought blessing out of the cruel act of the brothers, but that did not change wickedness into goodness. We may know how completely Joseph forgave his brothers, in that he put his arms around the neck of each one and kissed him. But not until he had done this did they dare to talk with him. Then followed the happiness of Joseph sending his brothers to bring the dear old father.

Illustration and Application

He wept aloud. This is but one of many illustrations of the familiar saying, "The bravest are the tenderest, the loving are the daring."

Royal Tears Some years ago Gen. David S. Stanley, of the United States army, was leading a force across the plains, laying out the route for a great railroad. There were 2,000 men, 2,500 horses and mules, and 250 wagons heavily laden. One day the general was riding at the head of the broad column, when suddenly his voice rang out, "Halt!" A bird's nest lay on the ground directly in front of him; in another moment the horses would have trampled on the nestlings. The mother bird was flying about and chirping in the greatest anxiety. But the brave general had not brought out his army to destroy a bird's nest. He paused for a moment, looked at the little birds in the nest below, and then gave the order, "Left oblique!" Men, horses, mules and wagons turned aside and spared the home of the helpless bird. Months and even years after, those who crossed the plain saw a great bend in the trail. It was the bend made to avoid crushing the bird's nest. Let no one think of tenderness as weakness. It is manliness and godliness at once. We look up and say, "Thy gentleness hath made me great." And this is also the crowning quality in that ideal of Christian manliness—"gentleman."

"HE FELL UPON HIS BROTHER BENJAMIN'S NECK AND WEPT"

They were troubled at his presence. It was remembered sin that made them miserable in the presence of Joseph's God-like kindness. In prison they had recalled their sin of twenty-one years before as vividly as if it had been of yesterday. "We are verily guilty concerning our brother in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us and we would not hear" (Gen. 42: 21). There had been, no doubt, a momentary sweetness in revenge when those less favored, because less worthy, sons of Jacob exiled the envied favorite by selling him into slavery. But we cannot too often repeat the saying, "Nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember." A sinful pleasure is pleasant only in the brief act, but bitter for years in memory—if unforgiven, for eternity. "Remember," God cries to Dives in hell, and his selfish enjoyments while neglecting the poor became flames of remorse to torture him. Even in this world it is not worth while to have a "good time" that passes away with the having, to leave in memory only pictures that arouse self-reproach for a score of years, or forever, much pleasanter to hang on memory's wall such pictures of doing good as brightened even the afflictions of Job (chap. 42).

A well-known photographer of New York recently had his country house overhauled. A new skylight was added and alterations were made in the roof. The men took their me and did not overwork themselves, but this did not prevent the roofer from presenting a bill almost as "steep" as calling. When the owner of the house expostulated, he explained to him that the men had to be paid for their me, and they had spent several days on the job. "No wonder," said the photographer; and then he produced a number of snap-shot photographs representing the men on the roof of his house as taken from the attic window of an adjoining building. Some were sitting smoking, some were reading newspapers, and others were lying on their backs. "Why," said the astonished roofer, "these are my men." "Exactly so," replied the photographer, "and they are earning my money." Memory takes snap-shots of all we do, and keeps negatives of every neglect and every fraud, and when the books of memory are opened, here or there, we must see our record, which only forgiveness can correct.

We scatter seeds with careless hand,
And dream we ne'er shall see them more;
But for a thousand years
Their fruit appears,
In weeds that mar the land,
Or healthful store.

The deeds we do, the words we say—
Into still air they seem to fleet,
We count them ever past;
But they shall last—
In the dread judgment they
And we shall meet.

I charge thee by the years gone by,
For the love's sake of brethren dear,
Keep thou the one true way,
In work and play,
Lest in that world their cry
Of woe thou hear. —JOHN KEEL

Come near to me. Let any one imagine Joseph taking an opposite course with his brothers, saying: "For

The Nobility of Forgiveness cruelty God has overruled for my good, but that is not in the least change of meanness of your act in selling me, my brother, for envy, and now you shall have 'anguish' and plead in vain for deliverance." Who does not see that in that case Joseph would have shown himself so ignoble at we should know no more of him than any of the other mummied grand viziers who died and left no sign? For the moment revenge may seem manlier than forgiveness in the calm test of history forgiveness is magnanimity, which means greatness of soul. A gentleman once told Sir Eardley Wort about an injury that had been done to him by an opponent. After describing all the circumstances, he said, "Don't you think I ought to resent and expose it? Won't that be the most manly course?" "Yes," answered Sir Eardley, "it would certainly be the most manly course to resent it, but it would be God-like to forgive it!"

In the following story we see how greatness give way in sublime moments: Captain Rankin of the Galatea hated Captain Frier of the Norwalk, a rival boat, and Captain Frazier hated him in return. They were caught out in a violent storm, in which the Galatea had her shaft broken. The ships came within hailing distance. "Shall we speak the Norwalk, sir?" asked the second officer. "Not if we can help it, sir," responded the skipper. But the indecision on the Galatea was dismissed by a signal coming from the Norwalk's mainmast. "What's the trouble?" it asked. Then the Galatea signalled the reply, "Shaft broken—unmanageable." "Shall I take off your passengers and crew?" asked the Norwalk. "Can't tell yet," was the reply. The next sentence that glimmered from the Norwalk's signal lights furnished the inspiration for a hymn that has been sung all over Christendom. It is, "I'll stand by until the morning—subject to your command." The next night the two rivals rode into port together, the disabled Galatea being towed by the belated Norwalk. Their passengers and cargoes had been discharged, and Captain Rankin walked over to the Norwalk's pier, where Captain Frazier was giving orders. "Goin' uptown, Fraz?" he asked. "Believe I am, Rankin," answered Frazier. And the grizzled sea-dogs, who had not spoken in years, strolled uptown, arm in arm. By mere brute strength or the adroitness of weapons we may conquer an enemy, and compel him to sue for pardon or mercy, but how much greater is the achievement of turning an enemy into a friend!

Be not grieved nor angry with yourselves. How kindly Joseph sought to palliate the awful sin of his brothers! Remembering them how a divine Providence had "made the wrath of man to praise him" and to serve and save man! We are in danger of being too lenient with our own sins, and too severe with the faults of others.

Let us reverse this propensity, and, while judging ourselves more severely, consider more charitably those whom we have wronged us, whose heredity and environment, perhaps, have been less favorable than ours. Thus the love of praise, if not the love of esteem or sympathy, shall be aroused to our enemies. So shall we pray, "Forgive as we forgive."

How to Learn to Love Your Enemies

Across Mountain and Prairie

A JOURNEY ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC FROM ST. PAUL TO VANCOUVER

MORE absolutely than at any time since Columbus first made the discovery, is the paradox true to-day for Americans that the quickest and most direct way of finding the East is to search for it in the West. Only four days of a pursuit of the horizon where the sun dips each day's end, are all that is necessary to make the modern traveler from the Eastern States realize that there are no longer such things as East and West, but only interims between the journey's starting-point and its destination. Especially is this true of a voyage over the Canadian Pacific from St. Paul, Minnesota, to Vancouver. In almost a straight line across the Northern half of our Continent the compound locomotive for four days rushes Westward in the beginning of effort to find the East. Beyond St. Paul, the Canadian Pacific, unlike the other great transcontinental railway systems of the Western Hemisphere, passes through cities and few towns of importance.

country in the world. One hears great accounts of the marvelous fertility of the virgin soil; farmers at the station will tell you of "forty bushels to the acre," and profits of many thousand dollars per year. I was informed that several hundreds of Americans have recently moved across the border, and taken up homestead claims in this province. For nearly five hundred miles west from Moose Jaw, the land is one unbroken prairie, sometimes undulating and rolling, more often flat as a table. For miles it is devoid of any sign of human habitation. Across it our train makes its way, stopping only to give the locomotive a drink of water at some tower built near a spring in the wilderness. In the centre of a copse of bushes, a gray prairie wolf stood motionless, staring at us as we passed him on the sleeping cars. His pose was as alert and expectant as though he were awaiting some Seton Thompson to take his photograph. At intervals scattered over the plain, are on further investigation I found that it does not move forward, but that it was a kindly glacier which was slowly receding.

One of the peculiarities of this part of the world is the almost entire absence of newspapers. The railway itself is one of the most important factors in binding a whole country together; but it crosses a primeval solitude. Apparently with a view to allaying the yearning for news, the railroad provides bulletin blackboards in the little railroad stations in the mountains, where the telegraph operator writes the most important events of the day the world over, as they are wired to him from Montreal.

At Kamloops, two hundred and fifty miles from Vancouver, the train is well on the down-grade towards the Pacific. The mountains dwindle into hills; the landscape is broken by pretty little lakes and winding rivers, along which cattle are grazing. Within six hours after leaving Kamloops, the first section of the journey to stations are fifty and one hundred miles apart. Waking on the Soo Line division of the Canadian Pacific the first morning from St. Paul, the passenger finds himself in the grain belt of North Dakota. On an average of about once in every hour, the train draws up at a little station, the midst of a cluster of small frame houses. The arrival of the puffing locomotive is apparently the event of the day, and a crowd of men, women, children and dogs are on the platform to watch it pass. They are brown and sunbaked; true children of the soil, which sometimes clings to them in considerable quantities, for this is the land where water is at a premium. At the American light is in their eyes, a light of hope and self-respect that are born of intelligence. To look at these North Dakotans, is to almost involuntarily contrast them with the peasantry of continental Europe. These are not "Men with Hoe;" they are men of the thrashing-machine and the hundreds of thousands of bushels. Outlined against the sky in the background is a public school-house, invariably the best building in the village. Between the villages there are few houses. Stubble in the field shows that grain crop has recently been harvested. Around are the signs of man's work, but man himself is few and far between. For hours, from the car window, one sees only the treeless land, on which the houses now constantly scarcer the nearer one approaches to the Canadian border. At the village of Portal are two railroad stations of the C. P. R. with not more than a quarter of a mile between them. Over floats the Stars and Stripes, and over the other the Union Jack. The two flags mark the line which separates our Republic from the Dominion.

On again into the wheat plains of Manitoba. Here the traveler has his first view of the sod houses which dot the prairie in clusters. Lumber is remote and expensive, and the new settler's first home is often this crude pile of prairie earth. One of this prairie of Assinaboia is said to be the most naturally productive wheat white skeletons. They are the bones of buffaloes who were once the monarchs of this domain. All around, too, through the short grass, are long, zigzagging lines, half furrow half trail. Over them the buffalo herds walked for ages in their travels from one river to another.

The entire stretch of country from Medicine Hat to Calgary keeps constantly in one's mind Freiligrath's lines on "The Steppes":

The trails where buffaloes have trod,
All seem to have been marked by God—
The furrows in a giant hand.

Calgary is the weather anomaly of North America. Its climate is a composite of the prairie wind and a dry mountain cold. Snow falls in Calgary in August, while it has days in January and February so mild as to make overcoats hardly necessary.

After Calgary the mountain. It is up-grade now, and our faithful locomotive is puffing hard, away in front of the long train, while an "extra" is pushing in the rear. At first the hills are low; nothing more than a sort of billows in the dead level of the plain; but they afterward steadily increase in height until, about forty miles from Calgary, one suddenly begins to realize that he is at the meeting place of the Selkirks and the Rockies, in the heart of some of the finest scenery in the world. In the very centre of mountain surroundings like these lies Banff, forty-five hundred feet above the sea, at the foot of Pechee mountain, twice as high. Banff has deservedly become one of the most famous summer resorts of Canada. By a happy arrangement, the hotels in these mountains furnish the meals for the railroad passengers in lieu of the dining-car, which is left behind before reaching Banff. This gives the passenger a chance to inhale the fresh mountain air, and to eat at a table that does not swing and lurch in rounding curves. Behind one of these restaurant hotels I made my first acquaintance with a real, live, cold glacier. It had the general appearance of a glazed lake of snow sliding down the side of a mountain, apparently always about to overwhelm the hotel, but the East, via the West, is over. We have reached Vancouver, where a big, white steamer—the Empress of China, is awaiting us.

The Famine in Shansi and Shensi

From the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, Chairman of the Famine Relief Committee in China, comes a letter which sheds more light upon the conditions that prevail in the famine-stricken province of Shensi. Mr. Smith writes from Chefoo, Aug. 20, to Dr. Klopsch, as follows:

"Your telegram, announcing a third remittance of $20,000, was some time in reaching me, but I telegraphed at once to Mr. Squiers, Secretary of U. S. Legation, asking him to consult Dr. Lowry, in Peking, and also Dr. Duncan, and others, in Shansi. Soon after sending the telegram, I received the enclosed letter from Dr. Edwards with some new details. . . . The China Inland missionaries in Shansi have telegraphed for more help in their work of reconstruction, which is one of great difficulty. Many Christians have recanted under the terrible pressure of last year. In the proclamation by the Governor, to which Dr. Edwards alludes, the facts of the famine are recited, and then it is mentioned that Drs. Atwood and Edwards of the American Jesus Church, 'having collected in their country much gold coin, have come to Shansi and Shensi, and, with no distinction of sect, have impartially relieved distress, thus exhibiting a fondness for virtue and benevolent deeds, with great kindness and no selfishness. All our suffering people ought to be unitedly thankful.' . . . The governor wishes his people to understand from this that the Jesus Church is not an 'irregular body' (literally 'like projecting teeth'), but a blessing to all the people."

In the letter from Dr. Edwards, which is dated at Tai-yuen-fu, (Shansi), Aug. 3, the writer says:

"Duncan, Smith, and Pereira start for Sian-fu (Shensi) early next week. The famine there is reported to be very bad, human flesh selling for 180 cash per catty."

GOOD COFFEE MAKER.

Experience With the Berry.

"I have gained twenty-five pounds since I left off coffee and began drinking Postum Food Coffee in its place."

I had become very thin in flesh and suffered tortures with heartburn, was a nervous wreck with headache practically all the time until one dreadful day when the good doctor told me I must quit drinking coffee, as he had nothing left to try, to relieve me.

I could not drink tea and had tried everything else, even Postum, but put it by at the first trial, because it was tasteless.

Forced to it again, I determined to see if it could not be made palatable and found at once that when I followed directions and boiled it long enough, that I not only liked it, but gave it to my husband for several days without his finding it out. I have the name of making splendid coffee, and we always used the best, but of late I have given Postum to guests many times in place of coffee and have never been detected yet.

Our four children have not drank coffee for three years, and all have gained health and flesh since using Postum. One son, who was always sick, has been greatly benefited by its use, and as above stated, I have gained twenty-five pounds since taking up Postum. I am healthier to-day than I have been for years and give Postum all the credit. Please do not use my name in public."

This lady lives in Burlington, Iowa, and the name will be furnished by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., to those interested.

brain in letters of fire as I rolled them like a sweet morsel under my tongue, imagining in that brief delirium of joy, that it was really me he loved instead of you—the unknown girl, whom I hated.

"Poor fool! conscience does not die as easily as some would have us think! Ere long I stood aghast, but it was too late. The mutilated letter, wet with my tears, crumpled by my passionate kisses, its fair page sullied with the ink I had in my haste dropped upon it, could never go beyond my keeping now. Even you would have pitied me then, dear—a soul so utterly desolate never stood upon God's earth. I dared not send you the ring alone, for, without the preparatory letter, you might have sent it back. I dared not tell the truth and face the scorn of my cousin's outraged confidence.

"How long I stood transfixed in agony I never knew. When at last I came to myself I was in bed, with a trained nurse in attendance. For weeks I hung between life and death, too weak to move, much less to think. An awful weight seemed crushing in upon my brain. Days and weeks passed, of awful, impenetrable silence; the horror of them makes me shudder even now. Long after, I learned how Guy, staying grandly at his post of duty, in a misery of hope deferred, had taken your silence at last as the knell of all his hopes. He wrote to me for news, but of course the letters were laid aside unanswered. He wrote to—, and was told that your relatives had moved away and that you were dead. When you told me your story that night in the gloaming, I could easily see that when you removed to Brixton with your aunt, and on her death went into the hospital with the malignant fever which you had caught from her, just where the clue was lost. The similarity of names accounted for the rumor, and no one would recognize in the pale nurse at Bellevue Hospital, with that strange wealth of silver hair, the radiant creature of Guy's dream. What a mystery life is! Three hearts breaking for want of each other, all within a radius of a few paltry miles.

"Guy accepted an important post under Government far in the Western States, and as the years passed I heard he was a wealthy man, and I; ah! heaven, you were well avenged!

"Then you were installed in the household to nurse this poor wounded life of mine back to health, and you fulfilled your task with an angel's skill. You found me a mocking demon, you have made me once more a human soul: it matters little that the earthly casket is beyond medicament.

"You thought I gave you strange welcome that first night you came, and attributed it to one of the many phases of my supposed disease. You did not know that I found myself confronted for the first time by my Nemesis in the flesh! How little you thought, as you tried to woo me with your patient winsomeness, that you were pointing the goads of remorse with an agony which made every nerve quiver. You did not know, those evenings when I forbade a light on account of my eyes, that I wanted to prove the truth of my miserable secret in your lovely chiselled face. How greedily I watched you, those long hours you thought me sleeping, until I seemed to read your very soul. Demons would have pitied me as I looked at you and thought of my poor Guy, and knew I had myself to thank for it all!

"I was conquered at last. I began to love you as I never thought I should love again. My one thought now was to be the means of bringing you together, as I had been the wretched cause of keeping you apart. Ah, me! who is it has said, 'to wreck a life, needs but a human will; to blend again the shattered fragments in harmonious union, needs a God!' I telegraphed for Guy to come to me at once, only to find that he was on the Continent. I cabled to his address there, and was told he had just left on a sea voyage, to be gone six months. I knew then I should never hear his dear voice say he forgave me, when he knew the truth. You wondered I grew worse so suddenly. Don't you know, dear, that hope is the strongest tonic you can have? My hope was dead?

"I have told him everything, and enclosed in the letter the tell-tale diamond which I had removed from what you thought my ring. Long ere he reads it I shall be beyond all human need, but whenever he comes, he will find you waiting, his ring on your finger, his snow-crowned queen! Remember, he has been waiting for your answer all these weary years."

The next morning dawned brightly, and Jean, with a strange jubilation in her heart, and a wondrous pity shining in her eyes, went softly through the quiet halls into the old-fashioned conservatory to dream among the flowers. Great orchids blazed at her from their hanging shelves, palms reared their graceful heads around her, and geraniums and hyacinths vied with each other in glory of crimson and white. How sweet the old world was.

"May I break in on your musings?" She flashed round upon him. He, too, had spent the night in vigil, and the brave eyes were strangely weary. One glance at her tender, smiling mouth, the pure face tinged with a sweet reserve, and impetuously he held out his hands, and Jean, conscious only that at last she was face to face with the only man she had ever loved, while the sunlight of the present dispersed the mystery of the past, laid hers within them without a word.

The day, like some delicious dream, passed all too quickly. Towards its close Jean stood in her own room, watching the dying sun flood meadow and lake with glory. Her lips parted in a smile as she thought how eagerly her kind friends had welcomed her into the family and Muriel's rapture over what she deemed the success of her scheme. There was a light tap at the door, and Guy came towards her, a spray of magnificent Marechal Niel buds and orange blossoms in his hand, which he laid lightly against her dress, with a caress in eyes and voice which spoke volumes. Early in the day he had pleaded for an immediate marriage.

"Why should we delay, dear heart? Surely we have paid a heavy enough penalty! Dr. Dollinger will be among the guests this evening, what could be more appropriate?" And Jean, looking into the eloquent face, hearing again Helen Davis' dying plea, gave shy and sweet consent.

He drew from his pocket now a tiny case and slipped on her finger a massive band of ruddy gold. "I judged well, did I not? I shall miss this little comforter, it has been my constant companion all these dreary years." Inside were their initials intertwined, with the date. "It was my first find of gold," he continued, "and I had it made into this, so that whenever I found you, all would be ready."

"And if you had not?" questioned Jean.

"It would have been buried with me."

The merry company hushed themselves into silence as Jean entered the room on Mr. Hazelton's arm. Her dress of soft cream flannel, with her badge of office, the white cross, upon her shoulder.

"I like it so," she had said, when Muriel urged that it was not bride-like; "you forget that I have been and am, married to my work."

"I like it also," and Guy kissed the silver hair reverently. "It always reminds me that I lost a beautiful girl and found an angel."

They stood together near the old-fashioned fireplace, the flames leaped and twined themselves about the massive logs and fell with cheery glow upon Jean's pure, pale face, and Guy's handsome bearded one. They stood apart in a holy stillness, this man and this woman, who had so well earned their right to the joy of union. Then every knee was bowed and the venerable clergyman lifted trembling hands of blessing over the silver head and the brown.

In the midst of the congratulations, Muriel sprang forward, and, catching up some sprays of holly, laid them lightly on Jean's hair.

"With joy and good-will I crown you, our Queen. Just think, you do belong to us now forever—our very own 'Aunt Jean.'"

AN IMMORTAL HYMN

The Story of the Authorship of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," which President McKinley Sang in the Shadow of Death

SIXTY years ago, across the Atlantic, a young woman, struggling through physical suffering and spiritual doubt to find her way to God, wrote the words of that beautiful hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee." A few weeks ago, the greatest and best-loved man in America, lay in a darkened room in Buffalo, racked with pain, dazed with anguish, tortured with the thought of leaving his fragile wife com-fortless, uttering no word of bitterness against his cowardly slayer, sinking with failing heart into the darkness of death, and singing, "Nearer, my God, to Thee, nearer to Thee!" After all was over, as his poor, mangled body was borne on its way to Washington and to Canton, all the bands played, and the men and women and little children sang: "Nearer, my God, to Thee." No hymn in all the sacred books of song—save "America" —is probably now so dear to the hearts of our people. "Nearer, my God, to Thee."
has become a national anthem. God grant

SARAH FLOWER ADAMS

that in our martyred President's hymn may be found the watchword for a new America!

Perhaps, Sarah Adams, the woman who wrote this hymn, did not think very much of it—so simple it was, so easily welling up from the depths of experience, it flowed from her pen. She had done ambitious, laborious work. For one thing, she had written a lengthy, dramatic poem—a religious play called "Viva Perpetua"—and she looked for great things to come of it.
Few people have heard of it; perhaps, like most of her productions, it is out of print. But the hymn has lived—there is in it that which strengthens and comforts men and women and makes them better —something which voices their own yearn-ings God-ward. Little did the writer think when she was pouring out her heart in these lines, that they would carry consolation and hope to so many troubled souls as have found true inspiration in them.

Of Sarah Flower Adams, not much has been written. She was born February 22, 1805, in a quiet English village. Her father, Benjamin Flower, was editor and proprietor of the Cambridge Intelligencer; he was a widower, and himself directed the education of his two daughters, Eliza and Sarah. Both were fragile, both were brilliant. Sarah early developed literary gifts, writing both prose and verse. Her sister was musical, and set Sarah's poems to music.

On the death of their father, the two girls became the wards of their pastor, Rev. William J. Fox, a noted London preacher and the Editor of a literary magazine, which numbered such famous contributors as John Stuart Mill, Harriet Martineau, Charles Dickens, Leigh Hunt and Robert Browning. On the list with these appeared Sarah Flower, and her work attracted a good deal of attention.
The charming home of the sisters, just opposite to that of Mr. Fox, was frequented by literary and musical people.
It was quite the fashion to admire the pretty, graceful young poet. She was, it is said, Robert Browning's first love. To her alone of all his friends, he showed his book of poems, and because of her encouragement and through her efforts they were published. Thus she has been called the discoverer of this master among the poets. Through her encouragement to another writer, the attachment sprang up which resulted in her marriage.

Among Mr. Fox's contributors was one who signed himself "Junius Redivivus." Through the magazine, she sent him a note expressing admiration of his work.
He replied. A literary correspondence, developing into one of cordial friendship, ensued. In 1833, she met Mr. William Bridges Adams, a man of scientific and literary attainments, and widely known as a civil engineer. It was a case almost of "love at first sight." It was only after their engagement that Sarah discovered in her betrothed, "Junius Redivivus," and he in her, the "S. Y." whose letters had so charmed him. They were married in 1834, and the union seems to have been a happy one. But her beloved sister was dying of consumption. Long years of watching over the suffering one, who faded slowly away, told upon the fragile poet;
and in 1848, two years after Eliza's death, Sarah passed away. We are told she died singing. At her funeral, one of her hymns was sung, "He giveth sun, he giveth shower," a sweet and touching lyric which yet holds a place in sacred song.

To Fox's Hymns and Anthems, published in 1840-41, Sarah Adams had contributed thirteen hymns. One of these was "Nearer, my God, to Thee," which with a number of others, was composed to be sung in Mr. Fox's church. The tune now so popular is the work of an American, Dr. Lowell Mason, of New York, who wrote the score in 1860.

In Immortal Hymns and Their Story, Dr. Louis Albert Banks says: "This hymn is a beautiful study of Jacob's vision at Luz. It is always sung by caravans of pilgrims from Christian lands, when in making the tour of Palestine, they camp at Bethel, near the scene of the patriarch's resting place." Dr. Banks relates many touching incidents, illustrative of its power to comfort in times of trial. Once, on a battlefield, a brave little drummer-boy, fearfully shot, went to heavensinging it. Bishop Marvin, homeless and desolate, wandering through a frontier wilderness, heard a poor woman in a wretched cabin singing it; and his faith was reassured. It is King Edward's favorite hymn as it was his mother's. It has been translated into many languages.
But to no other people now can it be just what it is to us; and on that lowly grave in the quiet village churchyard at Harlow, England, where Sarah Adams lies, many a flower will be laid by Americans who will pass that way.

The Destiny of the Jew

In the September issue of The People, the Land and the Book, the leading articles are: "Jewish Evangelization," by the Rev. Thomas B. McLeod, D.D.;
"May Hebrew Christians Keep the Sabbath?" by the Rev. William C. Daland;
"Modern Zionism," by a Zionist; and
"The Old Paths," by Alexander McCall, D.D., of England. The number is rich in specially excellent translations, including three Hebrew tales, one each from Austria, Denmark and Hungary, characteristically illustrated, and each in its way a literary gem. All the articles give evidence of scholarly qualities, and the magazine as a whole is one that ought to be specially valuable to students and entertaining and instructive to Bible readers generally. In the August number, the review of Jewish history, by the Rev. T.
Archer, D.D., of London, in his article on "The Dispersion of the Jews," was a presentation of absorbing interest. The People, the Land and the Book, now in its second volume, is published in the American Tract Society Building, New York; $1 a year; single copy, 25 cents.

BOXES OF GOLD.

Sent for Letters About Grape-Nuts.

330 boxes of gold and greenbacks will be sent to persons writing interesting and truthful letters about the good that has been done them by the use of Grape-Nuts food.

10 little boxes, each containing a $10 gold piece, will be sent the 10 writers of the most interesting letters.

20 boxes each containing a $5 gold piece to the 20 next most interesting writers, and a $1 greenback will go to each of the 300 next best. A committee of three not members of the Postum Co., will make decision between
Dec. 1st and 10th, 1901.

Write plain, sensible letters, giving detailed facts of ill-health caused from improper food and explain the improvement, the gain in strength, in weight, or in brain power after using Grape-Nuts food.

It is a profound fact that most ails of humanity come from improper and non-nourishing food, such as white bread, hot biscuit, starchy and uncooked cereals, etc.

A change to perfectly cooked, predigested food like Grape-Nuts, scientifically made and containing exactly the elements nature requires for building the delicate and wonderful cells of brain and body, will quickly change a half-sick person to a well person.
Food, good food, is nature's strongest weapon of defense.

Include in letter the true names and ad-resses, carefully written, of 20 persons, not very well, to whom we can write regarding the food relief by Grape-Nuts.

Almost every one interested in pure food is willing to have his or her name appear in the papers for such help as they may offer the human race. A request, however, to omit name will be respected. Try for one of the 330 prizes. Everyone has an equal show.
Don't write poetry, but just honest and interesting facts about the good you have obtained from the pure food Grape-Nuts. If a man or woman has found a true way to get well and keep well, it should be a pleasure to stretch a helping hand to humanity, by telling the facts.

Write your name and address plainly on letter and mail promptly to the Postum Cereal

The Story of an African King

HEATHEN AND SOT, YET THE GOSPEL IS SPREADING IN HIS DOMINIONS

FROM one of our most active missionary workers in Africa, the Rev. Erwin H. Richards, of Inhambane, Superintendent of the M. E. Missions in East Africa, comes an interesting letter, which explains some curious phases of Gospel work in the Dark Continent. After acknowledging receipt of ten dollars, sent to him through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, he writes as follows: "I send you a photograph of one of our native chiefs. His name is Patagwana, and his son has some name that was given him in the diamond fields—it may hap to be 'penny,' 'shilling' or 'pound,' breeches,' 'waistcoat' or 'dust-pan,' with many others. 'Blekfast,' is one of our native converts here (breakfast). 'Carriage' is the name of a man and 'shirt' of a lady, both of them leading converts on our oldest station. This chief, Patagwana, is a cross between the Batswa, who do not tattoo the face, and the knob-nosed Machopa, who tattoo the face and whole body. The chief owns several square miles of land, and is chief magistrate over all who reside on his lands. He has neither shirt, coat or other regular garment, never tasted bread, potatoes or steak; never slept on a bed, never combed his hair, saw the alphabet or heard of everlasting life. He knows how to make alcoholic drinks out of corn, Kaffir corn, farina, honey, cane, cashew and some few other ingredients, and he is maudlin most of the time. A portion of his 'palace' is seen in the cut. It is rudely built of sticks from the nearest available spot, selected without choice, reeds from the nearest swamp and mud from any handy pool. Grass, when there is any, forms the roof. Neither Patagwana nor any of his ancestors ever attempted to find out the truth of anything, or to improve their condition and surroundings. He will never care for truth, knowledge or everlasting life. He will say, as many other 'kings' of the land have said: 'Oh, I'm too old to learn anything; but here are my children, you can take them and do what you like with them.'

"These chiefs are easily induced to grant favors to the missionary, and once granted, they do not appear to readily cancel them. Four of our native converts have been for three years in possession of such grants for land, sufficient for mission purposes, and have at the present time hopeful schools and regular church services on each of the stations. At first, many people turn out on all occasions out of mere curiosity, to see, but not to hear. Later, they fall off in attendance almost entirely. Then a few children are persuaded to attend by the teacher, and in due time there is a church, with a wife or two of the chief and several of his children as first members, and ultimately a firm Christian institution is strongly planted there. It costs only one hundred dollars a year to keep the preacher and ten boarding pupils. This includes salary of teacher and preacher, and food for the pupils, housing, outfit, etc., for the first year, and after that, owing to their increase in need of clothing and school outfit, it takes $150 for a station. Those received at first are on probation, and are not cared for better than at their own homes. But after it is discovered that they are really in earnest and are worth our confidence, we clothe them, give them blankets and better housing, so that it costs about $10 per year per pupil. If after two years of probation, they manifest the fruits of having been born again, we receive them. "Look first at this poor ignorant, drunken native 'king,' and then at the neat church, with its intelligent and clean school children, and note how readily and how fully the Gospel changes the whole conditions of living, both for the present and for the hereafter. There are at present three or four teachers ready to be sent out to other native chiefs, and thousands of native villages awaiting the coming of the evangel; but there is nothing with which to support them. We have at present 54 full church members in good standing, with 132 probationers, 60 of whom are in our station boarding-schools. Our gain in probationers for the last three months has been 23. Our population is upwards of 3,000,000 souls, 2,900,000 of whom never saw a missionary probably, or ever heard of the life to come. We are trying to sow good seed in good ground, rather than merely utter the sound of the Gospel over vast mileages of wild natives from whom random fruits only could be expected. We welcome prayers, material aids and helpers from whatsoever source the Lord shall call them.

A Church of Three Languages

Christian Work in the Domestic and Foreign Field on International and Inter-denominational Principles

UNION in a double sense is the keynote of a movement, which comes to realization, in an interesting ceremony that takes place in New York on Sunday, October 20. A new church, a picture of which is here given, is then to be formally dedicated with appropriate services. It is situated at Seventy-second street, between Third and Lexington avenues.

MRS. R. TJADER

It will represent not only a union of denominations, but a union of nationalities. On Sundays there will be two services in English and one in German; on Wednesdays another service in German and on Tuesdays and Fridays a service in Swedish. Thus the building will serve three nationalities. It will also serve all Evangelical denominations in standing for the simple Gospel without sectarian bias.

The pastor of the church through whose efforts the movement originated, is Mr. Richard Tjader, of Stockholm, Sweden, who speaks fluently all three languages, and is an earnest advocate of inter-denominational aggressive work. He has a record in Europe which should insure him a hearty welcome from all Christian workers. In Stockholm he was pastor of one of the largest Free churches in the city, and is strongly commended to American Christians by Prince Oscar Bernadotte, the famous royal mission worker, the second son of King Oscar. Another testimonial to his usefulness is written by Sir George Williams, of London, the founder of Young Men's Christian Associations. The late Mr. D. L. Moody also, who witnessed Mr. Tjader's service, and availed himself frequently of his help here and in Europe, also wrote a letter shortly before his death acknowledging the value of his assistance, and praying for him a rich blessing on his labors. Many well-known ministers and laymen in Europe have also written in commendation of Mr. Tjader's energy, ability and devotion to Christ's cause.

Mr. Tjader's work has familiarized him with all classes. For about seven years he labored in Germany with the famous Swedish Evangelist Franson, traveling across the country from the Prussian frontier, on the east, to the farthest Western provinces in the Rhineland and Westphalia. The meetings were held sometimes in churches, often in the larger theatres, and occasionally in the ballrooms of aristocratic mansions. The success which attended them led a Russian Princess to desire a similar blessing for her own country. At her urgent request, Mr. Tjader made two visits to Russia, preaching in St. Petersburg and the Baltic provinces. In 1898, Mr. Tjader had the privilege of working with Mr. Moody in our Western States, and, at Mr. Moody's request, held meetings with Professor Towner in Chicago. During the following summer he took part in the North-field Conference.

Aggressive work in so many lands led Mr. Tjader to take a deep interest in mission work among the heathen. This interest was deepened and stimulated by a tour he took around the world with his wife, shortly after their marriage in the fall of 1899. Together they visited the stations of the foreign missionaries in heathen lands, and studied the problems of missionary work on the field. The result of their study was a new organization designed to extend still further the kingdom of Christ among the heathen. The sight of large districts in which the Gospel had never been preached, and the vast populations among whom only one or two missionaries were laboring, made a deep impression on the mind of the young worker, and he resolved, in Christ's strength, to do something definite to bring the Gospel speedily into neglected fields. On his return to America, he discussed his plans with earnest friends, and finally the International Union Mission was organized and regularly incorporated. Like the China Inland Mission it is undenominational, its broad, Christian platform being "Salvation through Christ to all who believe and are willing to begin a new life through the power of the Holy Spirit, and the full consecration of Spirit, Soul and body to Christ and for his service." Its aim is to stimulate interest in the home churches in foreign missionary work, to support missionaries who are laboring independently in heathen lands, and to send out new workers to fields as yet untouched by existing organizations. Already, although the Society has been in existence scarcely a year, it is supporting twenty missionaries and native evangelists in China and India. Mr. Tjader disclaims any idea of rivalry with existing societies, and seeks only to extend the work in co-operation and sympathetic fellowship with them on a broad evangelical basis.

REV. R. TJADER AND HIS INTERNATIONAL CHURCH

BIBLE READING*

Why the Superficial, Mechanical Perusal of God's Word Fails to Benefit the Reader

WHY do we read the Bible? The question is worth asking, if only for the purpose of finding out whether the reading is fulfilling the object desired. Some there are who read it as a matter of duty. The Christian Endeavor pledge requires it, and to read a chapter or two every day is not a very onerous duty. To open the book anywhere and read a certain quantity, or for a certain length of time, satisfies the obligation, and it is not important whether one reads Chronicles or Corinthians, Solomon's Song or in the Gospel of John. Some who read it less mechanically, read it as they might go to an arsenal to find weapons for theological disputation. Others read it for consolation, taking such parts as seem applicable to their own special circumstances and neglecting the remainder. The fourteenth chapter of John, the twenty-third and a few other Psalms, make up the Bible of this class of readers. To none of these classes is the wonderful book all that it might be, nor to any of them does it fulfil its true purpose. Many a person who boasts of having read the whole Bible a dozen or a score times knows little about it and is no better for the exercise.

The real reason why we should read the Bible is, that it contains the message of God to the human race, and is intended to be a guide to life in this world and a preparation for the world to come. To dip into it here and there, to read it mechanically and without an effort to grasp its meaning, or the lessons it contains that are pertinent to our circumstances, is to miss the object for which it was given and to lose the blessing it is capable of imparting. There is no special merit in mere cursory reading of the holy Book. The mere fact that half an hour or an hour every day is given up to the reading of its pages, does not make one a better Christian, nor fulfil the real purpose of the pledge. We treat no other book in that way. A student or a business man taking up a manual of the subject to which he is devoting his life, shows more intelligence in his use of it, than the average Christian does in the use of his Bible. The young lawyer or the young physician consults his authorities with some activity of mind, some effort to master the contents of his text-books. Quite as much intelligent effort is needed in the study of the Bible, and if we have a right appreciation of the issues involved, we shall make an infinitely greater effort to get at the meaning of the Book and apply its lessons. And such an effort pays. The truths it contains do not lie on the surface. It is a mine which must be worked, if it is to yield its valuable treasures for our use. Not that profound learning or great mental grasp is required. They may be brought to bear, with proportionate results; but without them the main purpose of the Book may be fulfilled. It is the alert mind, the devout spirit, the earnest desire to appropriate the lesson that will bring a blessing on the reading.

Sitting down to commence the study of the book, there ought to be an effort to conceive of God's mode of revealing himself to man. It is said that an ant cannot see a man, and there is an infinitely greater difference between God and his creatures than there is between a human being and an ant. We cannot see God, cannot really conceive of his majesty and infinity. How then could he make himself known? Holy and wise men obtained glimpses of his attributes; the Holy Spirit showed them parts of his ways, and to poets and prophets were granted visions of his modes of dealing with the world, and messages were intrusted to them for conveyance to men in terms which they could understand. Thus we get the Bible, which is, necessarily, more of a library than a single book. Having realized that fact, the next step is to get an idea of the individual books; when they were written, to whom they were written, and the general purpose each writer had in view. At various times in the world's history various truths needed to be taught. When a wrong conception of God prevailed, a man was raised up to correct the error. Gradually, and by stages, the conception of God is made clear. Moses and the Israelites in the wilderness did not have so intelligent and true an idea of him as did David and Solomon. nor did those two kings see him so clearly as did Isaiah and the later prophets. But they prepared the way for the glorious revelation made by him who could say: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." Even he did not complete the revelation. He was so perfect, so far superior to ordinary men that they could not understand him. So men with imperfections, men of a lower order, were commissioned to interpret him to the world, and Paul and Peter, James and John enable us to understand the teaching of the Christ. Inspiration runs through the whole volume in its histories, its parables, its philosophy, its poems, its prophecies, all tending toward the completion of revelation, so that we may know the character and will of God, and govern ourselves so as to please him. It is by understanding the Bible in this way that the reading of it is beneficial to the Christian life.

The Dream of Youth

(From an address by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan)

WHY is it that the elder man sometimes seems to check the hope of the young soul? If I could take that man aside I would say to him, "Why is it, my friend, that you have tried to check the dream and vision and hope of youth?" And I think his answer would be full of pathos. I think he would say to me, "I have tried to check that vision because I also once dreamed a dream and saw a vision and built my castle in the air. Oh, I see it now. How fair a dream it was, how wonderful a castle it was. But the years have gone, and I am now at the end of the day's work, the sun is westering, and look what I have built! Nothing but that!" "What is that, father?" "That is only a cube of solid masonry, and no line of it has any flashing splendor. I dreamed, and this is all I have done." "Wait a minute. Did you say that was solid masonry?" "Yes." "Did you say it was a cube, four-square?" "Yes." "Have you been honest about your work?" "Have you done your best?" "Yes." "Then know that a four-square thing always finds a place in God's four-square city, and presently, father, you will find that he will lift your slab of honest work and incorporate it into the city he is building, and then your solid, honest, commonplace work will be seen to flash with a splendor and glory that you have never dreamed of, even when you built your castle in the air." And, because I believe that, I want to say to fathers, Do not check the hope, the aspiration, the dream, the vision of these young people. God wants the hope and the dream to make them his.

WALKING WITH GOD

WALKING with God, oh! wonderful life, Calm and serene in the midst of earth's strife;

Walking with him, I am free from all dread, Filled with his Spirit, oh! softly I tread.

Walking with God, oh! fellowship sweet, Thus to know God, and in him be complete; Walking with him whom the world cannot know,

Oh! it is sweet through life thus to go.

Walking with God in sorrow's dark hour, Soothed and sustained by his infinite power; Oh! it is sweet to my soul thus to live, Filled with a peace which the world cannot give.

Walking with God, oh! may my life be Such that my Lord can walk always with me; Walking with him, I shall know day by day That he is my Father, and leads all the way. Poughkeepsie, N. Y. MARIA MITCHELL.

OCTOBER AT THE PAN-AMERICAN.

Less than thirty days remain before the gates of the Pan-American Exposition are closed forever.

During the crisp, cool days of October, Buffalo is at her best, and those who have delayed their visit until now will have the most delightful weather of the year in which to enjoy the wonders of the Rainbow City.

The same low rates are in force over the Lackawanna Railroad as during midsummer. At this season a daylight ride over the Lackawanna System is a journey long to be remembered. Through the Delaware Water Gap and over the Blue Ridge ranges the woods are radiant in their autumnal coloring, while the agricultural region of Western New York is mellowed by the wonderfully rich tones of the fall harvest time.

SIX solid vestibule trains are run daily between New York and Buffalo, with daily through service between New York and Chicago, and New York and St. Louis. Observation cars, dining cars and Pullman sleeping cars offer every comfort for the trip.

A beautiful guide, profusely illustrated, telling about the Exposition and its features will be sent on receipt of two cents in postage stamps. Write for one to T. W. Lee, General Passenger Agent, Lackawanna Railroad, New York.

AGNANIMITY IN POWER

...Joseph's Reception and Treatment of His Brothers

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN his homelife, in his slavery, and in his imprisonment, Joseph had learned to serve; and thus he was ready to God's hand in everything which happened to him. He must serve God in his relations with his brethren. Therefore he neither gloried himself over them by telling them of his greatness, nor yet did he indulge in his natural feelings of joy and interest in seeing the brethren whom he had neither seen nor heard of for over twenty years. His one thought was, What does God want of me? He would have me act that he may make himself known to my brethren?

Joseph spoke to his brethren through an interpreter; they knew not that he understood them when they said, "We are verily grieved concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us." He turned from them and wept, but the moment was not yet ripe for him to make himself known to them. The who would enter into God's plan for the conversion of his loved ones must learn patience and self-control. When all is ripe, God moves forward, to forestall him is to spoil his work.

Arrived in the land of Canaan, they told their father all which had befallen them, and when they opened their sacks, and each man found his money in his sack, they were afraid, and Jacob reproached them. Poor Jacob! he has not lifted by his faith in God above the power of circumstances. He was yet a man who looked at the "things which are seen and temporal." Contention came in between brother and his sons; the time was coming when there must be another journey to Egypt, or they must all die of hunger. Jacob decided that he would not let Benjamin go; his son repeated that the governor of the land had sworn that they should not see his face except their younger brother were with them, and he refused to go without him. At last Judah, the man in whom the spirit of rule was developing, took the matter in hand, and offered to be surety for Benjamin.

This arrangement was at last unwillingly acceded to by their father, and the brethren, with Benjamin, set out with their father's prayer: "God Almighty give you mercy before the man [how little he knew who that man was], that he may send away your other brother and Benjamin." But he added to a prayer, "If I be bereaved of my children I am bereaved." Poor Jacob sat down under his sorrow; he did not inquire of the Lord what it meant for him. How many so-called believers thus yield to sorrow! "All the things are against me" is imprinted on the faces, and sounds in the voices of many who would, nevertheless, take the position of children of God! Around them are believers who have heavier trials and more frequent they, but these being one with God in his plan for them, willing learners in God's school, their song is quite another. Counting it a joy when they fall into divers temptations or trials, they say, "All things work together for our good; God is love, and he knows we love him." It was with hearts heavier than that of Joseph when he first went into Egypt that his brethren took this second journey. With servile humility the approached the steward of Joseph's house to explain that they were no way responsible that their money was in their sacks, and the reply was, "Peace be to you [Salutation—the salutation of the East], fear not: Your God, the God of your father, hath given you treasure in your sacks: your money came to me" (Gen. 43: 23).

What? Was God, their father's God, known in Egypt? Surely the steward must have learned of Joseph to know God! But it was surprise upon surprise. They were brought into the governor's house, and even their asses cared for; and they learned that they were to dine with the governor himself at noon. Joseph accepted their present, asked after their aged father, and when he saw Benjamin, he said, "Is this your younger brother, of whom ye spake? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son." They set out, wondering at the change in the governor, when, not far from the city, Joseph's steward overtook them, charging them with stealing the silver cup. Their journey had seemed so prosperous, they were all together again; Benjamin was with them, the governor of Egypt seemed so favorable, and in conscious innocence they each opened his sack to be searched.

To their amazement, the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. They returned to the city, and fell before Joseph on the ground. Circumstances were all against them; they had no case, they could only yield to the overwhelming evidence against them. It was utter surrender when Judah said, "What shall we say to my lord? what shall we speak, or how shall we clear ourselves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants. Behold, we are our lord's servants, both we and he with whom the cup is found." Judah offered himself and all his brethren for bondmen, just what in their iniquity they had once made their brother Joseph. But Joseph would have Benjamin alone a slave. Then Judah, in the most touching language, told the story of his father's sorrow at parting with Benjamin. He told how his father was an old man, and Benjamin the child of his old age; his brother dead, and he alone left of his mother, "and his father loveth him." He told of Jacob's unwillingness to let Benjamin accompany them, saying if evil should befall him, they would bring down his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. And then he told how he had become surety for his young brother, and he offered himself as Benjamin's substitute. God's purpose was accomplished. Joseph's brethren were all broken now. Then Joseph commanded his servants to leave him alone with the men, and he made himself known unto his brethren.

What an announcement for his brothers! It is just with such an announcement to a lost sinner, when he who is not ashamed to call us brethren makes himself known in his power to save and to keep, and in his wondrous glory.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. These questions are printed Four weeks in advance, so that our readers have an opportunity to answer them.

II. For answers to the questions which appear below, when received, we will allow our readers the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append their name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department: Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Nov. 20

1. What is the significance of the frequent use of the number ten in the Bible, and in what particular instances is the number made prominent?

2. What is the origin of the phrase, "Freedom of the city," and what is its present significance?

3. Outside of sacred Scripture, what were the most striking instances in history of individuals being held for ransom?

4. What was Irving's basis for the Rip Van Winkle story, and where is its counterpart to be found?

5. What is the true definition of "martyr"? Does martyrdom imply conscious and voluntary suffering for a principle, and the positive rejection of an alternative which would avert that suffering, or can one become a martyr unconsciously?

Questions of the Week

1. What measure should be taken to protect public men from Anarchists while maintaining our freedom of asylum and freedom of speech?

Anarchy should be recognized as a dangerous delusion amounting to insanity, and the persons who manifest either by words or actions that they are insane in this respect should be permanently restrained or confined. If this measure were taken our public men would be thoroughly protected from the assaults of such madmen. Our freedom of asylum would be maintained; as under the statutes of the United States insane immigrants can be lawfully sent back to the country whence they came, and we would be relieved from the dangerous scum which is now pouring in upon us. Our freedom of speech would not be affected, as the babblings of those who are confined as insane would carry no weight, and would not be published. Finally, such a theory would not prevent the punishment of overt acts of anarchy.

A. T. JOHNSON.

Anarchists should be prohibited from publishing in book form, in the press, or in any other way that might influence others, any literature advocating their views. Nor should they be allowed to hold public meetings, the purpose of which is to preach their doctrines. To Emma Goldman's book can probably be traced the cause of President McKinley's assassination. Any attempt to organize anarchistic societies should be punished by deporting the leaders. Any attempt on the life of the President, Vice-President or a Cabinet member should be punished by death. "Freedom of speech," does not mean or include license to directly or indirectly threaten the life of a nation's high officer.

A. D. M.

2. Ought the franchise to be restricted, or should we continue to allow the ignorant loafer to cast a vote that counteracts the vote of the intelligent citizen?

The franchise should be restricted. If this were done, (1) justice would be served, (2) the ignorant loafer would have an incentive to learn and his ignorance would disappear, (3) his effort to learn would teach him to work. He would no longer be an ignorant loafer, but an intelligent citizen, fitted for the best use of the franchise. Thus both the ignorant loafer and the country at large would be benefited by a restriction of the franchise.

H. M. WOODRUFF.

We cannot afford to sacrifice manhood suffrage. It is the keystone of our liberties. To restrict the franchise would be to create, at a single stroke, a "governing class," which would ultimately crush the Republic. There should be no ruling class, no governing class, no class legislation. Restricted suffrage would be a step backward in the direction of mediæval oppression. But while the use of the ballot should be open to all (men and women alike), the voter should be compelled to qualify (1) as being able to read and write; (2), as not being a criminal. Poverty is not a crime, and should not prevent the exercise of the suffrage. The remedy for present conditions is in our own hands. With compulsory education everywhere enforced, there soon need be no "ignorant loafer" problem. Let us do nothing unworthy of the Republic; or that would cause its noble and broad-minded founders to shudder, could they revisit these scenes, and see the dangers that menace "government of, for, and by the people."

D. H. GREENE.

The franchise ought to be restricted. It is not right for those who contribute nothing to society materially, mentally, or morally, to have the same voice in the government of the community as those who have produced the material, mental and moral resources of the community. There is a sense in which conscientious decision and a peaceable acquiescence.

WALTER W. HUBBARD.

He should resign. He cannot honestly hold his position. He undertook to preach the doctrines of a certain Church with the understanding that he was to teach said doctrines as the Church taught and hold the same. Therefore, for him to continue in the Church and teach contrary to what she teaches is dishonest. As to whether he sees the truth in the right light or not is out of the question. He may be right and the Church wrong, still that would not justify him in continuing in the Church in which he promised to preach as she sees the truth.

A. D. MEARES.

4. Does incompatibility of temper ever reach a point justifying divorce?

Undoubtedly, yes. No line of argument will ever show that the Creator of the Universe ever intended that one of his beings should ever voluntarily browbeat and abuse another who had no means of defense, and who was denied the right of flight. No stigma whatever should rest on one who seeks divorce from one with whom happiness is an utter impossibility. Because a man or woman has, through mistake, been united to a brute affairs should justify divorce. If both man and wife offend, it is certainly not reasonable "to divorce savages and barbarians, because they act as such towards each other." If one occupies an attitude of prudent conciliation much can be done to better conditions, a life together is practicable, although unpleasant. In short, the domestic infelicity arising from incompatibility of temper fails to demonstrate an absolute impossibility that the duty of married life can ever be properly discharged and until that impossibility is clearly shown the integrity of a bond as sacred as that marriage should be maintained.

A. T. JOHNSON.

5. In view of the fact that Paul withstood Peter "because he was to be blamed" (Gal. 2: 14) may we regard both men as inspired?

The question of inspiration is not involved in the incident that took place at Antioch when Apostle Paul rebuked Apostle Peter for his inconsistency. It is simply a question of human weakness. While under the influence of certain High Church Jewish Christians, who came from James, Peter withdrew and separated himself from the Antioch Christians, "fearing them of the circumcision." The result was that Barnabas, and doubtless many others, were affected by his example, which became a scandal in the community. To save the Church from an apostasy, Peter took Peter to task for his conduct and rebuked him openly, as his conduct was an attack on Gospel liberty. The writings of Paul and Peter that have found their way into the New Testament Canon are, beyond all doubt, inspired, but to say that every word uttered during their Christian lives was inspired is what we do not believe. Paul and Peter had human weaknesses and limitations like other men. But when they wrote, authoritatively under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, they were kept free from errors and mistakes, and in this way were inspired.

Miscellaneous Questions

Moses H. Sydenham, Editor of The Central Star of Empire, of Kearney, Neb., sends these suggestions, which we commend to the attention of pastors and readers generally:

1. Urge the display of Jehovah's Ten Commandments on the walls of every public school-room every grade in this Republic! The saloon politicians, infidels, agnostics, sceptics, and Jesuits have been running our schools quite long enough. 2. Urge that our church pastors do something more for their salaries than simply preaching sermons on Sundays, with probably running prayer-meeting Thursday nights. Urge them to open their churches every night through the week and encourage the worldly to come by a continuous revival—not just for a few weeks, and then give over to Satan! Satan's servants have their places of worship—the saloon, etc.—open all the time, every day and night, and Sunday, too, when they can.

From a soldier in Washington Barrack D. C., this grateful letter comes:

DEAR EDITOR:—I have long desired to write you an expression of my appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I have been a soldier the past three years, and my duty has been such to prevent me from attending divine services. I have received your paper through Mrs. Ida Morton of South Edmeston, N. Y. My constant companions are the Bible and the Herald. I paper has been a ray of sunshine to my life, dispelling much of the gloom and sadness that generally settle around a soldier. I trust that all my friends will enjoy your paper as much as I have.

Hospital Corps, U. S. A.

M. C. W.

E. H., Washington, D. C. Can one be a follower of Christ and be a lyncher or an anarchist? No. Christ's kingdom is not one of violence. He counseled obedience to law and to constituted authority. He rebuked his disciples, when they would have resisted with swords. His followers, faithful to his teachings, should be neither law-breakers nor disturbers of the peace. A lyncher violates the law to wreak revenge in specific instances; an anarchist is an enemy of all law and government, and would destroy both.

C. F. C., Marsh, Pa. To what extent may a Christian pray for means to pay a debt incurred preparing for the ministry, when his income barely provides an economical living?

We make no mistake in taking all our care and burdens to our Father. As to praying for specific material blessings, it is very doubtful whether a Christian should do so, except in cases of real emergency. He should seek the spiritual blessing, and all the rest will be added, according to the Divine promise. God will assuredly open a way for us out of our troubles, if we ask him.

A PERSONAL CARD FROM DR. KLOPSCH

I APPEAL to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to co-operate with me in a matter that gives me great concern. Most of our readers correctly suspect that my life is a very busy one. Time has become a very important factor with me, and the problem ever before me is that of reducing matters to such a system that the handling of them may involve no needless waste in that direction.

My first care is, of course, the proper and satisfactory administration of CHRISTIAN HERALD affairs, and it is in connection with these that I invite your help. During the months of October and November, it is comparatively easy to ship premiums and renew subscriptions promptly. During December we receive from 10,000 to 15,000 letters a day, and it is difficult then to handle the business to the entire satisfaction of our subscribers—particularly on account of the pressure on mail and express facilities incident to the Holiday Season.

If our own subscribers would co-operate with us, by renewing during October and November, we could give them the best service; and that is what we are planning to do. Neither delays by mail, nor by express would then interfere with their plans or ours. To ensure this best and promptest service to the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family is the object of this appeal.

Renew NOW. You lose nothing, as your subscription will be dated ahead from the present date of expiry, and not from the date of your remittance. You will thus help me personally more than you can imagine, and relieve me of much care and anxiety, for which I shall be ever grateful. I want to please you; HELP ME TO DO IT.

society is like a stock company and every one is entitled to be heard in proportion to the amount of resources he has contributed. But the best practical plan of the suffrage that can be fallen upon is an equal individual franchise of such as measure up to given conditions. Those conditions should be such as to empower the man of real character, and debar the man of bad character and no capability in the affairs of an industrious and moral free community. Such plans are being increasingly sought after in the hope of purifying elections and uplifting legislation.

3. If a pastor can no longer preach the doctrines of the church to which he belongs, ought he to resign, or try to lead his people to the truth as he sees it?

All denominations have a distinctive creed or confession of faith, and a pastor is engaged to preach the Word of God in conformity to the doctrines of a certain Church. Being a consecrated servant of God, he should make the utmost endeavor to lead on and lift up his flock to truer aspects of the divine will, which God has revealed unto him. He cannot do otherwise and be faithful. With sincerity and candor he should frankly state to the Church (convincingly if possible) his divergent views and abide by their decision on the matter. He ought not to remain, unless upheld in his course by the Church, and he ought not to resign without one supreme effort to convince them of the truth and justify his own position. Reason demands a full presentation of the case, a fair consideration, instead of a loving helpmeet, is no reason or argument why such condition is bound to continue till death, but rather an argument for separation, that the innocent may be, perchance, united to some one with whom the pursuit of happiness may be continued to life's close.

WM. W. CASY.

If, after a long trial, a man or woman finds home life intolerable, on account of differences in temper, there should be a separation, in hope that time would remedy the difficulty. A divorce is wrong; the Bible tells us that a man who marries a divorced woman, or vice-versa, is an adulterer. On the other hand, for a man and woman to live together in constant discord is very injurious, not only to the chief parties, but to the children that might be brought into the world. If a quarrelsome disposition would not be inherited, it would be attained by the constant influence of example. Separation would remove the danger of the influence over weaker minds, while there would be a possibility of differences being adjusted and reunion taking place.

ROSALIE I. CUSACK.

The friction which is known as incompatibility of temper, usually manifests itself in petulance, mere rudeness, disagreeable manners or constant ebullitions of ill-temper—in popular phrase, man and wife cannot get along together. The highest point of such unpleasantness is reached when the state becomes chronic. It is, however, neither reasonable nor expedient that such a state of

THE REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN AT HOME

The Great English Divine Settles Among us—He will Carry Forward Evangelist Moody's Life-work

WHEN the distinguished English divine, the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, was called to take Mr. Moody's Northfield work, he settled himself in that has been called the "home city" of the country. Baltimore is a city of churches as well as Brooklyn, and statistics show that the church attendance here, in proportion to population, is greater than in any of the larger communities in the United States. Eutaw Place, where Mr. Morgan has his home, resembles one of the Champs-Élysées in Paris. It is a very artistically laid-out avenue. From the front window of the Morgan house, one has a refreshing view of trees, shrubs and flower-beds. One of the rarest buildings is a Jewish temple, one of the finest in the country. In the suburbs are country houses with grounds that recall the West of England, with its rolling hills and deep valleys.

Mr. Morgan, like all of the English, has a fondness for outdoor life, otherwise the strain of his labor would probably soon break him down. Yet his appearance is deceitful. The average observer might believe a tall, slender man, with pronounced intellectual features, a semi-invalid, requiring the constant care of a physician; but he is really possessed of great vitality and has an excellent constitution. He is a hard worker. Rising about seven o'clock, as soon as morning devotions and breakfast are over, he is found in his study reading, writing or dictating. He may remain thus engaged for the forenoon, or merely an hour; but while he works, his pen or the stenographer's pencil flies over the paper as rapidly as it can move. All of his addresses are prepared with extreme care. He takes voluminous notes, yet he never reads his sermons, and the listener might imagine that he was preaching extemporaneously. He is a great reader, and the walls of his library and study give an indication of his literary tastes. He is an ardent lover of art, and has some very choice works. A hundred portraits of divines and laymen, both American and British, are within range of his eyes, the portrait of his great American friend, Mr. Moody, having the place of honor, on his writing table.

Mrs. Morgan is an excellent wife of the English gentleman. Her wedded life began in 1888. She is extremely domestic in her tastes, with all the devotion and affection necessary for the rearing of her children. The three sons show already the mother-training, although the eldest is but eleven and the youngest five years of age. Percival Campbell, the oldest, is truly named after his father. Kingsley John is the second child, and the youngest is Crossley Frank, Crossley being the name of one of his father's most intimate friends. They are all bright and unusually intelligent for their age. A daughter died several years ago. The head of the household may be truly called a family man, being not only a parent but companion to his children, sympathizing with them in their troubles and becoming one of them in their recreations.

MRS. MORGAN

THE RESIDENCE IN BALTIMORE

THE MORGAN CHILDREN

Clergymen of all denominations have given Mr. Morgan a hearty welcome to Baltimore. When arrangements were made for the opening series of his meetings in Baltimore this fall the principal clergymen cordially approved of the idea.

The plan to be followed in Baltimore is to be carried out all over the country, and Mr. Morgan will probably conduct the Northfield extension work in all of the more important cities. It is the intention to be entirely undenominational, and he will only conduct services in response to calls extended him by the representative Protestant clergymen of a community. Already the ings are, of course, open to all, the idea is to arouse more interest in religious work among those who have had the advantages of such instruction—to expand and increase what might be called Christian sentiment, in the belief that those who are affected, will act as assistants in the spreading of real Christianity. It is doubtful if any other man could have been selected more fit for this work. Mr. Moody recognized Mr. Morgan's ability from the first, and, as is well known, considered him his most able assistant at the Northfield meetings.

Mr. Morgan's friends among the ministers and laymen at London and Birmingham will not believe that he intends taking up his residence in America permanently. Dr. Parker, of London, in his farewell address to Mr. Morgan, said: "This is the only ray of comfort I have about the whole business. He will be glad when he is seated in the City Temple once more. We shall be glad to see him. He will return, bearing his sheaves with him, and we shall thank God in a grateful and resounding anthem." "Gypsy" Smith, the noted English evangelist, whose work was one of the incentives that led Mr. Morgan to devote his life to such labor as he is performing, offered his tribute at the same meeting. "We shall see him again," he said. "He will come back, and if he does not come back, some of us will go to America. If we are spared until he comes back, we will give him the same welcome, and if we are not spared, then, from the battlements of the Homeland, we will wait to welcome him there."

Strong in home evangelism, there is no warmer friend and supporter of foreign missions than Mr. Morgan. At the recent annual meeting of the American Board, in Hartford, Conn., he delivered an eloquent address on missionary effort, and rebuked the Christian Church for its apathy and indifference. All that has been done in the past, he said, has been accomplished by a few enthusiasts. Christ commanded missionary work and every Christian should gladly obey. It is ours to hope right on. Missionary effort is the necessity of Christian life, and we cannot escape from it. The first conscious thrill of the life of God within the human soul is a missionary passion. The Church is a union of saints with Christ for the salvation of men.

THE REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN IN HIS STUDY

demand for these meetings is so great that his dates are filled for the balance of the present year, while plans are being prepared which cover 1902. The Congregationalist church, to which he properly belongs, has not a large following in Baltimore, although the Associate Reformed congregation, one of the largest in the city, really represents this denomination. It is probable that Dr. Morgan will be affiliated with this church, and at times will fill the pulpit at the invitation of the pas-

A Warm Invitation

TEXTS { "COME." Gen. 6: 18
"COME." Rev. 22: 17

IMPERIAL, tender and all-persuasive is the word "Come." Six hundred and seventy-eight times it is found in the Scriptures. It stands at the front gate of the Bible as in my first text, inviting ante-diluvians into Noah's ark, and it stands at the other gate of the Bible as in my second text, inviting the post-diluvians of all later ages into the ark of a Saviour's mercy. "Come" is only a word of four letters, but it is the queen of words, and nearly the entire nation of English vocabulary bows to its sceptre. It is an ocean into which empties ten thousand rivers of meaning. Other words drive, but this beckons. All moods of feeling hath that word "Come." Sometimes it weeps and sometimes it laughs. Sometimes it prays, sometimes it tempts, and sometimes it destroys. It sounds from the door of the church and from the seraglios of sin, from the gates of heaven and the gates of hell. It is confluent and accrescent of all power. It is the heirress of most of the past and the almoner of most of the future. "Come!" You may pronounce it so that all the heavens will be heard in its cadences, or pronounce it so that all the woes of time and eternity shall reverberate in its one syllable. It is on the lip of saint and profligate. It is the mightiest of all solicitants either for good or bad.

To-day I weigh anchor, and haul in the planks, and set sail on that great word, although I am sure I will not be able to reach the further shore. I will let down the fathoming line into this sea and try to measure its depths, and, though I tie together all the cables and cordage I have on board, I will not be able to touch bottom. All the power of the Christian religion is in that word—"Come." The dictatorial and commendatory in religion are of no avail. The imperative mood is not the appropriate mood when we would have people savingly impressed. They may be coerced, but they cannot be driven. Our hearts are like our homes; at a friendly knock the door will be opened, but an attempt to force open our door would land the assailant in prison. Our theological seminaries, which keep young men three years in their curriculum before launching them into the ministry, will do well if in so short a time they can teach the candidates for the holy office how to say with right emphasis and intonation and power that one word—"Come!" That man who has such efficiency in Christian work, and that woman who has such power to persuade people to quit the wrong and begin the right, went through a series of losses, bereavements, persecutions and the trials of twenty or thirty years before they could make it a triumph of grace every time they uttered the word "Come."

Victims of Invitation

You must remember that in many cases our "Come" has a mightier "Come" to conquer before it has any effect at all. Just give me the accurate census, the statistics of how many are down in fraud, in drunkenness, in gambling, in impurity, or in vice of any sort, and I will give you the accurate census or statistics of how many have been slain by the word "Come." "Come and click wine-glasses with me at this ivory bar." "Come and see what we can win at this gaming table." "Come, enter with me this doubtful speculation!" "Come with me and read those infidel tracts on Christianity." "Come with me to a place of bad amusement." "Come with me in a gay bout through the underground-life of the city." If in this city there are twenty thousand who are down in moral character, then twenty thousand fell under the power of the word "Come." I was reading of a wife whose husband had been overthrown by strong drink, and she went to the saloon where he was ruined, and she said: "Give me back my husband." And the bartender, pointing to a maudlin and battered man drowning in the corner of the bar-room, said: "There he is; Jim, wake up; here's your wife come for you." And the woman said: "Do you call that my husband? What have you been doing with him? Is that the manly brow? Is that the clear eye? Is that the noble heart that I married? What vile drug have you given him that has turned him into a fiend? Take your tiger claws off of him. Uncoil those serpent folds of evil habit that are crushing him. Give me back my husband, the one with whom I stood at the altar ten years ago. Give him back to me." Victim was he, as millions of others have been, of the word "Come!"

Now we want all the world over to harness this word for good as others have harnessed it for evil, and it will draw the five continents and the seas between them, yea, it will draw the whole earth back to the God from whom it has wandered. It is that wooing and persuasive word that will lead men to give up their sins. Was scepticism ever brought into love of the truth by an ebullition of hot words against infidelity? Was ever the blasphemer stopped in his oaths by denunciation of blasphemy? Was ever a drunkard weaned from his cups by the temperance lecturer's mimicry of staggering step and hiccup? No. It was: "Come with me to church to-day and hear our singing"; "Come and let me introduce you to a Christian man whom you will be sure to admire"; "Come with me into associations that are cheerful and good and inspiring"; "Come with me into joy such as you never before experienced."

With that word which has done so much for others I approach you to-day. Are you all right with God? "No," you say, "I think not; I am sometimes alarmed when I think of him; I fear I will not be ready to meet him in the last day; my heart is not right with God." Come then and have it made right. Through the Christ who died to save you, come! What is the use in waiting? The longer you wait the further off you are and the deeper you are down. Strike out for heaven! You remember that a few years ago a steamer called the Princess Alice, with a crowd of excursionists aboard, sank in the Thames, and there was an awful sacrifice of life. A boatman from the shore put out for the rescue, and he had a big boat, and he got it so full it would not hold another person, and as he laid hold of the oars to pull for the shore, leaving hundreds helpless and drowning, he cried out, "Oh, that I had a bigger boat!" Thank God I am not thus limited, and that I can promise room for all in this Gospel boat. Get in; get in! And yet there is room. Room in the heart of a pardoning God. Room in heaven.

Invitation to Solace

I also apply the word of my text to those who would like practical comfort. If any ever escape the struggle of life, I have not found them. They are not certainly among the prosperous classes. In most cases it was a struggle all the way up till they reached the prosperity, and since they have reached these heights there have been perplexities, anxieties, and crises which were almost enough to shatter the nerves and turn the brain. It would be hard to tell which have the biggest fight in this world, the prosperities or the adversities, the conspicuities or the obscurities. Just as soon as you have enough success to attract the attention of others, the envies and jealousies are let loose from their kennel. The greatest crime that you can commit in the estimation of others is to get on better than they do. They think your addition is their subtraction. Five hundred persons start for a certain goal of success; one reaches it, and the other four hundred and ninety-nine are mad. It would take volumes to hold the story of the wrongs, outrages, and defamations that have come upon you as a result of your success. The warm sun of prosperity brings into life a swamp full of annoying insects. On the other hand, the unfortunate classes have their struggles for maintenance. To achieve a livelihood by one who had nothing to start with, and after a while for a family as well, and carry this on until children are reared and educated and fairly started in the world, and to do this amid all the rivalries of business and the uncertainty of crops and the fickleness of tariff legislation, with an occasional labor strike and here and there a financial panic thrown in, is a mighty thing to do, and there are hundreds and thousands of such heroes and heroines who live unsung and die unhonored.

What we all need, whether up or down in life or halfway between, is the infinite solace of the Christian religion. And so we employ the word—"Come!" It will take all eternity to find out the number of business men who have been strengthened by the promises of God, and the people who have been fed by the ravens when other resources gave out, and the men and women who, going into this battle armed only with needle or saw, or axe, or yardstick, or pen, or type, or shovel, or shoe-last, have gained a victory that made the heavens resound. With all the resources of God promised for every exigency, no one need be left in the lurch.

Faith in Operation

I like the faith displayed years ago in Drury Lane, London, in a humble home where every particle of food had given out, and a kindly soul entered with tea and other table supplies, and found a kettle on the fire ready for the tea. The benevolent lady said: "How is it that you have the kettle ready for the tea when you had no tea in the house?" And the daughter in the home said: "Mother would have me put the kettle on the fire, and when I said 'what is the use of doing so, when we have nothing in the house?' she said, 'my child, God will provide; thirty years he has already provided for me through all my pain and helplessness, and he will not leave me to starve at last: He will send us help though we do not yet see how.' We have been waiting all the day for something to come, but until we saw you we knew not how it was to come." Such things the world may call coincidences, but I call them almighty deliverances, and though you do not hear of them, they are occurring every hour of every day and in all parts of Christendom.

Experience Qualifies

But the word "Come" applied to those who need solace will amount to nothing unless it be uttered by some one who has experienced that solace. It spreads the responsibility of giving this Gospel comfort among a great many. Those who have lost property and been consoled by religion in that trial, are the ones to invite those who have failed in business. Those who have lost their health and been consoled by religion, are the ones to invite those who are in poor health. Those who have had bereavements and been consoled in the bereavements are the ones to sympathize with those who have lost father, or mother, or companion, or child, or friend. What multitudes of us are alive to-day in good health, and buoyant in this journey of life, who would have been broken down or dead long ago but for the sustaining and cheering help of our holy religion. So we say—"Come!" The well is not dry. The buckets are not empty. The supply is not exhausted. There is just as much mercy and condolence and soothing power in God as before the first grave was dug, or the first tear started, or the first heart broke, or the first accident happened, or the first fortune vanished. Those of us who have felt the consolatory power of religion have a right to speak out of our own experiences, and say—"Come!"

What dismal work of condolence the world makes when it attempts to condole! The plaster they spread does not stick. The broken bones under their barage do not knit. A farmer was lost in a snow-storm on a prairie of the far West. Night coming on, and after he was almost frantic from not knowing what way to go, his sleigh struck the rut of another sleigh and he said, "I will follow this rut, and it will take me out to safety." He hastened on until he heard the bells of the preceding horses, but, coming up, he found that that man was also lost, and, as is the tendency of those who are thus confused in the forest, or on the moors, they were both moving in a circle and the runner of the one lost sleigh was following the runner of the other lost sleigh round and round. At last occurred to them to look at the north star, which was peering through the night, and by the direction of the star they got home again. Those who follow the advice of this world in time of perplexity are in a fearful round, for it is one bewildered soul following another bewildered soul, and only those who have in such times got their eye on the morning star of our Christian faith can find their way out, or be strong enough to lead others with an all-persuasive invitation.

What the Invitation Means

"But," says some one, "you Christian people keep telling us to 'come,' yet you do not tell us how to come. That charge shall not be true on this occasion. Come, believing! Come repenting! Come praying! After all that God has been doing for six thousand years sometimes through patriarchs, and sometimes through prophets, and at last through the culmination of all the tragedies on Golgotha, can anyone think that God will not welcome your coming? Will a father at vast outlay construct a mansion for his son, and lay out parks with statues, and green with foliage, and all a-spark with fountains, and then not allow his son to live in the house, or walk in the parks? Has God built this house of Gospel mercy and will he then refuse entrance to his children? Will a government at great expense build life-saving stations all along the coast and boats that can hover unhurt like a petrel over the wildest surges, and then, when the life-boat has reached the wreck of ship in the offing, not allow the drowning to seize the life-line or take the boat for the shore in safety? Shall God provide at the cost of his only Son's assassination escape for a sinking world, and then turn a deaf ear to the cry that comes up from the breakers?"

"But," you say, "there are so many things I have to believe and so many things in the shape of a creed that I have to adopt, that I am kept back." No; no! You need believe but two things; namely, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and that you are one of them. "But," you say, "I do believe both of those things!" Do you really believe them with a your heart? "Yes." Why, then, you have passed from death into life. Why, then, you are a son or a daughter

CHURCH OF ST. JOHN (EPISCOPAL), WASHINGTON, D. C.

REV. ALEXANDER MACKAY-SMITH

INTERIOR OF CHURCH OF ST. JOHN

A CHURCH of MANY PRESIDENTS

St. John's, in Washington, where Fourteen Executives, from Madison to Lincoln, have Worshipped

OPPPOSITE the White House on Lafayette Square, in Washington, is St. John's Episcopal Church, which is known in the national capital as the "Court Church," by reason of the large number of diplomats and public officials who have always worshipped there. It is one of the historic church edifices of the country and is fraught with interesting associations. So many Chief Magistrates have regularly worshipped there that for many years a pew has been set aside for the President of the United States. The pew, because of the limited seating capacity of the building, has been occupied some time past by Secretary Hitchcock of the Interior Department, who surrendered it to the wife of President Roosevelt upon her arrival in Washington.

Presidents Worshipped There

In this church fourteen Presidents of the United States have worshipped, including every Chief Executive from Madison to Lincoln. The building is simple, old-fashioned and unpretentious in the extreme. It was erected in 1816, and was designed by Benjamin Latrobe, architect of the United States Capitol. The church is in the form of a Latin cross, and is well-lighted in many places by a profusion of Virginia creeper and English ivy. The original design of the building was in the form of a Grecian cross, but in 1820 it was given its present contour by the addition of a portico, supported by six columns. Save for interior furnishings, the edifice has changed little in appearance in three quarters of a century. The pews are small and covered with red damask, while the altar, with its cross of gold, manifests similar simplicity. Immediately after the completion of the church, and before any pews had been sold, a committee from the city called upon President Madison, and offered him a pew, which he accepted, and thereafter occupied quite regularly. Although all the men who presided over the destinies of the nation, from the time St. John's Church was completed until after the Civil War, were more or less regular attendants at services at the little house of worship opposite the Executive Mansion, not all of them were regular members of the congregation. Enrolled among the latter, however, are the names of James Madison, James Monroe, Martin Van Buren, William Henry Harrison, John Tyler, and Zachary Taylor. Two memorial windows in the church perpetuate the record of this membership.

Notable Memorial Services

Mrs. Letitia Tyler, wife of President Tyler, was a communicant of the Episcopal Church, and when she died the rector of St. John's Church, Dr. Hawley, preached the funeral sermon at the Presidential mansion. The funeral of the famous Dolly Madison, widow of President Madison, was held at St. John's Church, a stone's throw from the house in which she died.

Of the later Presidents, Arthur was the most regular attendant at the "Court Church," although most of the other Chief Magistrates of the past third of a century have gone there on special occasions. The late President McKinley once told the rector that it was his custom, when in the White House, to wheel his chair into a position from which he could see the spire of old St. John's, and that the sight invariably soothed and comforted him. One of the last occasions upon which President McKinley attended services at St. John's, was at the time of the memorial service in honor of the late Queen Victoria.

Among the present members of the congregation at St. John's are Admiral Dewey, Chief Justice Fuller, General Miles, Lord Pauncefoot, the British Ambassador, and a host of Cabinet members, diplomats and Senators. To serve upon the vestry at St. John's, has, from time immemorial, been accounted one of the greatest honors at the national capital, and it is reported that Admiral Dewey, when asked one day as to his highest personal ambition, next to achieving victory at Manila, replied jokingly, that it was to be allowed to retire and live peacefully in Washington, in order that he might be permitted to "pass the plate at St. John's." General Winfield Scott served as a member of the vestry of this church for more than a score of years, and a handsome window, dedicated to his memory, was presented to the church by Hamilton Fish. President Arthur presented to the church a most beautiful window in memory of his wife, and, after he died, the vestry placed below it a tablet to his memory. Other windows are commemorative of various officers of the Army and Navy, including General Robert C. Buchanan and Rear-Admiral Charles Wilkes.

Many notable services have been held at St. John's. In addition to the obsequies already mentioned, there might be noted those of Ex-Secretary John Sherman and Lord Herschel, Ex-Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. Here Lady Curzon, the Vicereine of India, was married, and here also took place the wedding of Hon. Lillian Pauncefoot, the daughter of the British Ambassador, and Mr. Robert Bromley.

The Rector of St. John's

The Rector of St. John's is Rev. Alexander Mackay-Smith, a man of large means, who combines with great ability an unusual gift of eloquence. He is assisted by Rev. Frank H. Bigelow, M.A., and Rev. Ernest M. Paddock, B.D. The Rector of the "Court Church" is deeply interested in charitable work of all kinds. The enormous receipts of St. John's and the comparatively small expense for the maintenance of the church itself, make it practicable to render aid to many worthy institutions. The congregation supports outright St. Mary's Colored Chapel and St. John's Orphanage, both large and thoroughly deserving enterprises.

A Warm Invitation

the Lord Almighty. Why, then, you are an heir or heiress of an inheritance that will declare dividends from now until long after the stars are dead. Hallelujah! Prince of God, why do you not come and take your crown? Princess of the Lord Almighty, why do you not mount your throne? Pass up into the light. Your lot is anchored, why do you not go ashore. Just plant your feet hard down and you will feel under them the rock of Ages. I challenge the universe for one instance in which a man in the right spirit appealed for the salvation of the Gospel and did not get it. Man, are you going to let all the years of your life go by with you without your having this great peace, this glorious hope, this bright expectancy? Are you going to let the pearl of great price lie in the dust at your feet because you are too indolent or too proud to stoop down and pick it up? Will you wear the chain of evil habit when near by you is the hammer that could with one stroke snap the shackle? Will you stay in the son of sin when here is a Gospel key that could unlock your incarceration? No; no!

An Avalanche of Power

As the one word, "Come," has sometimes brought many souls to Christ, I will try the experiment of piling into a mountain and then send down in an avalanche of power many of these Gospel "Comes." "Come thou into all thy house into the ark"; "Come unto me all ye who labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest"; "Come, for all things are now ready"; "Come with us and we will do you good"; "Come and see"; "The Spirit and the Bride say 'Come' and let him that heareth say 'Come' and let him that is athirst come." The stroke of one bell in a tower may be sweet, but a score of bells well tuned and rightly lifted and skillfully swung in one great chime fill the heavens with music almost celestial. And no one who has heard the mighty chimes in the towers of Amsterdam or Ghent or Copenhagen can forget them. Now, it seems to me that in this Sabbath hour all heaven is chiming, and the voices of departed friends and kindred ring down the sky, saying, "Come!" The angels who never fell, bending from sapphire thrones, are chanting "Come!" Yea, all the towers of heaven, tower of martyrs, tower of prophets, tower of apostles, tower of evangelists, tower of the temple of the Lord God and the Lamb, are chiming, "Come! Come!" Pardon for all, and peace for all, and heaven for all who will come.

Authoritative Proclamation

When Russia was in one of her great wars, the suffering of the soldiers had been long and bitter, and they were waiting for the end of the strife. One day a messenger in great excitement ran among the tents of the army shouting, "Peace! Peace!" The sentinel on guard asked, "Who says 'Peace?'" And the sick soldier turned on his hospital mattress and asked, "Who says 'Peace?'" and all up and down the encampment of the Russians went the question, "Who says 'Peace?'" Then the messenger responded: "The Czar says, 'Peace.'" That was enough. That meant going home. That meant the war was over. No more wounds and no more long marches. So to-day, as one of the Lord's messengers, I move through these great encampments of souls and cry, "Peace between earth and heaven! Peace between God and man! Peace between your repenting soul and a pardoning Lord!"

If you ask me, "Who says 'Peace?'" I answer, "Christ our King declares it." "My peace I give unto you!" "Peace of God that passeth all understanding!" Everlasting Peace!

India Helps Starving China

(From the Bombay Guardian)

WHILE suffering continues to overwhelm, hearts that can sympathize devise means of rendering help, and it is a testimony to the power of Christianity when the forces of good are organized on behalf of terrors in remote places of the earth. We have this week received for the relief of famine in China the sum of rs. 59 from village Christians, of Godhra circuit, per Rev. Robert Ward; also rs. 5 from Mrs. B. (the address by oversight was not noted); also the sum of rs. 30 from G. C. F., South India. This will all be forwarded to the editor of the New York CHRISTIAN HERALD, to form part of the magnificent volume of relief being gathered in that centre. It should be remembered when Christians such as these in the Godhra villages give, that the amount represents perhaps ten times more self-sacrifice than if given by a community of similar numbers in an English village.

ALL EAGER TO SAVE MISS STONE

THE ABDUCTED MISSIONARY KEPT PRISONER ON A MOUNTAIN IN TURKEY—HER EARLY RELEASE EXPECTED

IF the expectations of the United States Government and those of the American Board of Foreign Missions are realized, Miss Ellen M. Stone, the missionary who was lately abducted by brigands on the Turko-Bulgarian frontier, will in all probability be free and restored to her friends before this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of its readers. Assurances have been received from both the Bulgarian and Turkish Governments that earnest efforts are being made for her release, but it has been considered prudent to withdraw the troops who were pursuing the brigands. It was feared that the latter, finding themselves closely pressed, might kill their prisoner, rather than permit her to be rescued. Bulgarian police have traced the bandits to Gueltepe mountain, near Dubnitsa, on the Turko-Bulgarian border. A cable despatch from Sofia, says some shepherds have informed the Bulgarian officials that Miss Stone and eighteen of her captors are on the heights of Jakorunda (or Jakurut), in Turkish territory. A third rumor located the captive at Rilo, in a Greek convent. U. S. Consul-General Dickinson, noting the activity of the troops sent against the bandits, urged Bulgaria to wait until Miss Stone was liberated in pursuance of the pending negotiations before making any attempt at suppressing the outlaws by force.

Up to October 14, there had been no definite news of the abducted missionary beyond what is stated above. It was understood, however, that negotiations were still going on, secretly, for her release; but whether these were progressing favorably or otherwise was not disclosed. Dr. Haskell, a missionary of the American Board, and Consul-General Dickinson are both at Samokov, where they are still trying to arrange terms with the brigands; but the recent attempt to surround and capture the band before the prisoner's release nearly upset the entire negotiations and might have resulted in Miss Stone's life being sacrificed. This experience has made the outlaws wary, and if again molested, they may make the prisoner suffer for the zeal of her friends. Miss Stone is said to be well cared for. She is not living in a cave, but is kept prisoner in the home of a peasant in the mountains.

Up to October 14, one-half of the ransom had been contributed. It was learned that the bandits had insisted upon the payment of the whole before their prisoner would be set free. They pledged their simple word that faith would be kept, and there was no alternative but to accept these conditions. The first instalment to be paid amounts to $35,000, and this, it is understood, has already been handed over, being transferred by Consul-General Dickinson to Missionary Haskell, whom the brigands themselves selected as the agent. Officially, our Government takes no cognizance of the ransom fund payment, though unofficially it is aiding, by all the means in its power, the movement to secure Miss Stone's early release. The Washington authorities, in order to save her life, would even urge Bulgaria and Turkey to grant amnesty to the bandits for her liberation, were such a step necessary.

As has already been stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there is a suspicion of politics in the abduction. One significant fact is that the amount demanded as ransom for Miss Stone is practically the same as that paid by Turkey to the United States last summer as indemnity. Still another view is, that the capture has been instigated by the Macedonian Revolutionary Committee, to make trouble between Turkey and the United States. It is only just to Bulgaria to state that that Government has strenuously denied any responsibility for the abduction. It points out that while nothing is positively known of the composition of the brigand band, it was undoubtedly formed in Turkey; that Miss Stone was captured near Mehomia, a short distance from a Turkish post, and her captors were seen on Oct. 9, in the hills between the Turkish villages of Eleschnitz and Jakorunda; all these facts tending to show that she has never left Turkish territory.

It is believed by the Washington authorities that the missionary will doubtless be released soon as the ransom is paid. Part of the ransom fund has already been forwarded to the American charge-d'affaires at Constantinople. After the release, and as soon as the responsibility is fixed, this Government will demand a substantial indemnity, in behalf of Miss Stone.

At the annual meeting of the American Board, held in Hartford recently, the case of Miss Stone was freely discussed. President Capen announced that the abductors and their victim had been traced to a mountain in Bulgaria, and that the lady would soon be rescued, as troops had surrounded the retreat. He said:

"It is a comfort in our tears to know that our Government is doing everything that possibly can be done for her rescue. Secretary Smith and myself met President Roosevelt and Assistant Secretary Adey in conference over this matter. The President has made this case his own; if Miss Stone were a member of his own family he could hardly put more heart or more energy into the rescue. Every power of diplomacy is being used for her rescue. It may be necessary that a ransom will be paid, but that will not close the incident; it will be but the beginning of the chapter."

The report of the Prudential Committee of the Board recited in detail the action the Board had taken in the case. Referring to the conference in Washington, the report said: "It was evident the positive conviction of the Government that this step (the payment of the ransom) was the first to be taken. When she is released, there will be a vigorous attempt not only to secure the return of the money, but, furthermore, to bring about such conditions that such an occurrence shall not be possible in the future." The Government itself is the custodian of the ransom fund now being contributed for Miss Stone's release. In accordance with the Government's wish, the Boston bankers have not made any public statement concerning the amount of money in hand, or the sum sent to pay part of the ransom. Such a statement will be made later. Meanwhile, the State Department is anxious to have all the money necessary raised as soon as possible.

In addition to the sums already acknowledged in last week's issue, the following contributions to the Stone ransom fund have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Previously acknowledged.....	$2,160.00
P. F. Collier.....	25.00
George L. Elliott.....	25.00

SOUL-WINNING UNDER CANVAS

A MEMORABLE GOSPEL CAMPAIGN IN BINGHAMTON AND ITS SUBURBS

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., and the adjoining manufacturing town of Lestershire, have been enjoying a Gospel tent campaign of three weeks' duration, which has been in many ways a remarkable one. Two tents have been in the field, under the management of one committee. The services opened on Sunday, September 1. In Binghamton, the tent was in the heart of the business section of the city, while in Lestershire the canvas was pitched in the vicinity of the shoe factory. In the Binghamton tent, known as the "Glad Tidings," Prof. W. S. Weeden and Rev. J. W. Van de Venter were the workers, while under the Lestershire canvas, christened "Park Place Tent," by reason of its location, Ferdinand Schiverea was the moving spirit, with Evangelist John A. Davis and Prof. W. H. Pike as assistants.

This tent campaign was born in the minds and hearts of some business men, and when it was suggested to the Ministerial Association that body questioned its ability to successfully arrange the financial end of it, and voted not to undertake it. Undaunted by obstacles, the business men said: "We'll have a tent campaign, anyway, and father it ourselves. If the Lord's hand is in the enterprise—as we herein believe it to be—we can well afford to trust him for the money, and all else." Accordingly, the "Union Gospel Tent Campaign Committee" was organized, with W. S. Reed as Chairman, and L. M. Bowers, of the American Linseed Co., as treasurer. The wisdom of the undertaking has been demonstrated at every meeting. While the weather remained favorable the evangelist spoke nightly to 1,000 and 1,800 people, for the most part those who were not accustomed to frequenting churches. The numbers who confessed Christ have, on some occasions, been more than a score in a single service, and on one Sunday afternoon when Mr. Schiverea spoke to men only, thirty-five persons confessed Christ. Mr. Schiverea spoke, and Prof. Weeden sang on two occasions from the Colossians at the noon hour, before a large gathering of men and women; and in Lestershire daily open-air noon-meetings were held. So successful has the campaign been that already plans are being perfected for another campaign, with at least three tents in the field. Prof. Weeden and Rev. Van de Venter, as well as Mr. Schiverea, have spent the entire summer in this kind of work. Messrs. Weeden and Van de Venter have labored at Piqua and Shelby, Ohio, and at Warren, Pa., while Mr. Schiverea has given nearly all his time to the Philadelphia Tent Work Committee.

During the last days of the Binghamton campaign, Fanny J. Crosby, the blind hymn writer, labored under the auspices of the committee, and with many hearts by her moving presentation of the story of Jesus and his love. J. R. CLEMENT

ABRAHAM'S WELL, BEERSHEBA

THE POOL OF HEZEKIAH

JOB'S WELL (BIR EYUB)

V. THE WELLS and POOLS of PALESTINE

IN the hot countries, the question of water is always a serious one. In Egypt, of course, the only problem is how to raise the water of the Nile to the level of the fields, and great quantities of it are drunk by the people. Palestine was described to Israel as "land that drinketh water of the rain of heaven" (Isa. 44: 3), and the saving of rain-water was the problem in the country. Nor could it have taken the people long to see that, by assisting nature a little, the winter torrent flowing to waste could be made to fill a reservoir.

SECTION OF JACOB'S WELL

In Hezekiah's Pool, within the wall of Jerusalem, we have such a reservoir, some two hundred and forty feet long, by half as wide, and twenty deep. The stone taken out here might have been used nearby to build the city wall or other structures. Outside the wall, in the valley of Hinnom, is a similar pool; but this, from its location in a valley, needed a dam at the lower end. Still more is that true of the three great reservoirs in the valley of Urtas, south of Jerusalem, known as Solomon's Pools, and anciently used to supply drinking water to the city.*

Great care was taken that no water should run to waste, and so the reservoirs in Jerusalem are connected by conduits through the rock, which must have been pierced with great labor. At the point of overflowing, the highest in a series sent its water to the next, and so on down, until the last, as at Siloam, would water the gardens in the King's Dale.

When this system was in use, there were fountains at which the people could drink; but they are now out of order and useless. In traveling through the country, signs are found which answer the same purpose, and about these the women gather with their jars. The ornamental masonry may be much broken, but if water continues to flow the people are content. It is said that a beggar in Jerusalem asks only for bread in winter, and only for water in summer; and when the little reservoirs under the houses are emptied, water is brought in from a mile away, and sold from goat-skins, borne on the backs of donkeys.

It is, however, about the deep wells that interest especially gathers, and the first question at Jacob's Well is, "Why was it dug?" The question is natural, for there is running water nearby from the springs of Shechem, now Nablus. The answer is, that the value of the water was so great that a sojourner like Jacob must provide water for his own flocks, or he could not be suffered to remain. Jacob's well is wholly undisputed, and no one doubts that it is more than three thousand years old. As we approach it, we find that it does not come up to the level of the ground, and we must climb down to it over rough rocks. This is due to the custom of the early Christians to build churches over sacred places. There was no harm in this while the buildings stood, but when they fell, through war or earthquake, the result was most deplorable. Now, Jacob's Well once had its curb above the surface, and our Lord sat there and talked with the Samaritan woman; but now the ruined church blocks the entrance. When we get down to it, we find that the mouth of the well is a stone block, well designed to keep surface water or dirt out of it, and that the mouth shows marks of the ropes used with the leather buckets. The well has been very thoroughly explored. The bottom of it is somewhat filled up with stones, but the explorers went down as far as they could, and examined it. It is now walled around.

THE WELLS OF BEERSHEBA

Of all the wells in Palestine, none can be more interesting than the group at Beersheba, in the south. At the time that Abraham began to make them, his nearest neighbors were the Philistines, and there was some strife among the herdmen until Abraham and their king, Abimelech, made a covenant. From this covenant, the well or wells were called Beer-sheba, "well of the oath," and from the fact that Abraham slew at that time seven lambs, there has always been a tradition that the wells were seven in number. But travelers could not find so many—some only two, some as many as five—and it was only last year that Prof. George Robinson, of Chicago, found all seven.

Five of the wells he found open and in use. The sixth one had been found by laying bare some of the curbing stones, but it is not yet cleared out. The seventh was shown him under injunction of secrecy, as a man had built a garden wall and did not dare to let his discovery be known; but he showed some of the rope-worn curbing stones. It seems that the government, which taxes the planting of a tree, also sets itself against opening the wells.

Seven wells would seem excessive if this were not an excellent grazing region, and it is pleasant to know that the Bedouin are increasing their flocks and needing more water than formerly. Well number one, as Professor Robinson numbers them from the west, is free from additions, but that two and five have sakihs or Egyptian wheels, with a series of pockets, and that four has a pulley arrangement. This would imply that the Arabs mean to irrigate lands for crops, as well as to water their herds. We see one of the old troughs, into which the water was poured for the flocks, and we remember how Rebekah poured out for the beasts, after she had given drink to Abraham's steward. At the well, Jacob also met Rachel, and at the well Moses met Zipporah, no doubt near the ending of the day, when the flocks were gathering home and the weary travelers were looking for rest and Eastern hospitality.

Wells were always approached with eagerness. On their long journey, the Israelites sang over a well in Moab, "Spring up, O well; sing ye to it" (Numbers 21: 17), and Robertson of Irvine has made a beautiful poem upon it beginning:

As when pilgrims, faint and weary, where the sandy billows swell,
Sing, across the desert dreary, "Spring up, O well!"
So the church, the royal daughter, brought in wilderness to dwell, Sings, in search of living water, "Spring up, O well!"

The Memorial Arch

THE violent paroxysm of the nation's agony at the taking off of our late President has calmed into the question, What can we do to perpetuate his memory? The poets will keep on chiming their cantos of praise, and the sculptors will put his noble form into marble and all the great cities of the land will lift their tall shafts of carved masonry; but in Washington, the capital, it has been resolved to commemorate our martyred President in a grand and glorious and magnificent arch. That is God's favorite form, the tree-branches in an arch, the rainbow in an arch, the over-spanning heavens in an arch. It is a shape, a form that hovers with descending beauty and rises with ascending charm. In the "Washington Monument" at our capital we have all that can be done in high pillar of stone to suggest the majestic character of our first President, but I am glad that at a recent meeting in Washington it was resolved to build for William McKinley an arch, for that suggests the arm of the nation's affection thrown over the memory of a man whose virtues will be known a thousand years if this world so long continues. The arch, not like that at the head of Champs Elysees, commemorating Napoleon's victory at Austerlitz, for soon after came the defeat at Waterloo. An arch, not like that of Titus, which celebrated his return from a great siege, but who at his death had only one regret, and that a sadness that he had not put to death his own brother. An arch, but not like that of Janus, for that celebrated a heathen deity. An arch, but not like that of Severus, for that commemorated a conqueror who could not conquer himself, and who banished his own sister from Rome, because she spake such imperfect Latin. Desecrations all these of the God-originated arch. But the arch which we will build near the entrance of the great bridge which will soon leap the Potomac, will be in honor of one whose life was one long scene of moral triumph, victory over early environment, victory over later antagonisms, victory that led him on from his mother's knee till he took the throne of the nation.

All creeds and religions will join in rearing that memorial arch, so broad was William McKinley's religion. While positive in his own belief and an advocate of the doctrines of his own denomination, he took us all in. He did not believe that the human race must go into heaven through one small gate, but thought, as many of us do, that we may have twelve choices of gates: "On the East three gates, on the West three gates, on the North three gates, and on the South three gates." My right to my religion implies your right to your religion. On the platform of the meeting that night, when we laid the plans for building the Memorial Arch, all religions were represented, and the lion and the lamb laid down together, and we could not tell which was the lion and which the lamb. No one will doubt that our departed President was worthy of all that art and patriotism can do in keeping him in memory. He had many attractive qualities, but in all my acquaintance with him, since thirty years ago I was on the platform with him at Canton, Ohio, he presiding, until our last interview, the characteristic that seemed dominant in his nature was love—love of wife, love of children, love of country, love of God. And how the nation responded in the same feeling, and so many tears were never shed over any other grave, and so many bells were never tolled for one obsequy, and never before did all the wheels of traffic and business and manufacture come to a dead halt for five minutes.

I am informed that the Memorial Arch will be erected on United States property, and that will make it your arch and my arch, and the arch of every man, woman, and child in our nation. If ever a heart was large enough to take in all sections of this country, from the St. Lawrence River to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the New York Narrows to the Golden Horn of the Pacific, that heart was the heart of William McKinley. Proposing, as he did in his speech at Atlanta, Ga., that the cemeteries of the Confederate soldiers as well as the cemeteries of the Federal soldiers be protected and sculptured, and on Decoration Day floralized, let us fulfil his wishes next thirtieth of May, when we embroider with flowers the pillows of the slain. Peace to the ashes of the brave boys who fell in battle, whether they wore the blue or the gray! Peace to all those whose lips have taken the sacrament of the dust! Let the United States Government do as a mother does when her two boys are killed in a quarrel. She does not stop to ask which was in the right and which was in the wrong, but, putting one arm over one boy and her other arm over the other boy, kisses them both. So in the springtime let our motherly government treat the slain of the Civil War; putting one arm over the Northern grave and the other arm over the Southern grave, let her give them both a patriotic caress.

It is right that a costly mausoleum be built at Canton, Ohio, where the President sleeps with his two children, and where he will wait the coming of her who was more than all else to him in life and death; but we need something appropriate in the national capital, where he did his greatest work and won his most lasting fame. In the parks of the capital, in equestrian statuary, where ride the heroes McPherson and Thomas and Logan, and where will soon ride our William T. Sherman, there ought to be a most impressive commemoration of our assassinated ruler.

He must have known that the nation would do him these monumental honors, for I am glad to say that while in election times he was roundly abused, he was praised to his face as no American ever was. It is a bad habit we have in this country of denouncing our public men until dead, and then, by big funerals, attempting to atone for the wrongs we did them when they were alive. We do not give them the bread of praise while they live, but we give them a stone when they are dead. Again and again have State legislatures passed resolutions bitterly condemning their United States Senators, but when the Senators were dead they were in the State capitol put on wondrous catafalques and the minute guns sounded, and everything was craped into midnight gloom. I am glad that our Nation began its triumphal arch for Mr. McKinley while yet his keen eyes could see it and his illumined face could respond to it.

If on that memorial arch to be lifted there is to be any especial sculpturing of the scenes of that good man's lifetime, I hope there is one phase of his life that will come out clear and strong. If on one side the arch the sculptor shall represent him on Capitol Hill addressing a great multitude on Inauguration Day, on the other side, let it be a home scene. William McKinley was a home-body. Wherever he went he took his home with him. Never in your time or mine has there been a better fulfilment of the conjugal oath. "In sickness, and in health, till death us do part." There are many people who would testify that the vow was kept from the day when the bride and groom joined hands in the Presbyterian Church at Canton, Ohio, until those hands were unclasped in the last good-bye. In these days, when light literature puts into frivolity and derision the most sacred relationship, it will be well if sculptor's chisel on the arch to be raised shall cut in marble William McKinley at home. How much that wife was to that husband he never told us in words, but he told us in more powerful actions. I warrant, she helped him ascend that ladder of power and fame until he reached the topmost rung. I warrant that his extraordinary kindness to her was preceded by her extraordinary kindness to him. The wife seldom gets her due. Men go out into the commercial, or professional, or political world, and do great things, and get all the credit, while in most cases there is a reason at home for the marked success. There is a silent partner in that firm, and she is not always silent, either. There has yet to be a re-distribution of coronets. Women of America come up and get your dues. Yes, put the home-life of William McKinley on that coming arch. He made that word home a more sympathetic word, a more tender word, a more momentous word than ever before. God bless our homes! If we are right there we are all right, if we are wrong there we are all wrong.

Soon let the Memorial Arch arise at Washington. Let not the severest elements of nature damage it. May no accident occur during its construction. May the sunlight of many centuries gild it. May it stand with its lessons of home, and liberty, and righteousness until the last bondage is broken, and our dear old world has completed its work, and the angel of the Apocalypse, standing with one foot on the sea and the other foot on the land, shall "swear by him that liveth forever and ever that time shall be no longer."

An Editor's Farewell

OUR readers will be interested in the following addition we are able to make to the tribute paid this journal on October 9, to the memory of Dr. W. C. Gray, editor of The Interior. It is a pathetic message, having the flavor of a patriarchal blessing for his brethren of the press. In publishing it, The Interior says:

A few days before his death, when the periods of consciousness were perceptibly growing briefer and farther apart, Dr. Gray suddenly waked from a profound slumber and said, "I have a message I wish to deliver." An assistant hurried to his side with pencil and paper, and he dictated, without hesitation, correction or revision, the following lines:

"I expect within a few hours to glide off the stays like a launching ship and be afloat on the wide ocean of eternity, and I desire to say to my contemporaries of the press, whom I am probably the senior, that they have contributed to the pleasures of my long editorial life. I have never let one of the fraternity who did not leave me happier when he retired. There has, therefore, grown up in me a more than respectful, even an affectionate, regard for the members of the religious editorial fraternity, and to them I send a cordial and loving greeting. I expect in a few hours to be in shadows which are only a brighter life, and from that region I call back most cordially, God prosper and bless you all!"

W. C. GRAY

Only a few weeks before the beginning of his illness, he wrote in his journal the following beautiful expression of the premonitions he felt, that the end was not far off:

In the old times of river navigation, we were accustomed to loiter at a poor hotel of the period, or walk up and down the landing, waiting the coming steamboat. The shores of the stream were, at that time, covered with forests, and the winding channel gave but short vistas. But while yet near away the boat would blow its hoarse blast, and we sometimes could see her pillar of smoke rising above the trees. The air was busy excitement, a hurrying to and fro of stevedores and truckmen and passengers. When she had landed and made her exchanges, and turned her prow again into the stream, there was fluttering of handkerchiefs from the shore, and not infrequently some tears.

It seems to me that I have heard the sound of the coming ship pretty distinctly at times, and more faintly and softly at others, the peal modified by the wind and by the trees. But anyway, the boat is on the river and headed my way. She is already past due, and must not be expected to delay any longer. Already I see her plumes of smoke and hear the splash of her wheels, and I step upon her deck for a journey into the unknown, from which there is no return.

He was not mistaken. The ship was indeed near at hand. When it came for him, there was no trepidation, no reluctance. His words were those of a man who thought about to sail into the unknown, as "soothed and sustained by an unflinching trust."

Farmers' Wives

NO class of persons is more deserving of sympathy than the wives of modern American farmers. This applies especially to those in the eastern section of our country. In proportion to numbers, more of them become inmates of the lunatic asylums than of any other class. This is attributable to the perpetual grind of labor, and the unbroken monotony of their lives. The social features of the old-time farm disappeared when cheap transportation made farming profitless. The "help" was discharged, and the farmer and his wife have since been compelled to do all the work themselves. Many of the farms have been sold to foreigners for less than the value of the improvements. The churches are no longer centres of social life; indeed, many are closed for the want of support. Hence the deplorable condition of farmers' wives.

A hopeful era has now happily begun. If ex-President Wanamaker had done nothing more for humanity than the inauguration of the free rural delivery of the mails, he deserves a monument, and he already has the gratitude of millions of farmers' wives. One every day they are brought into touch with the outside world. Daily papers are taken where before was only the village weekly, and there is more frequent interchange of correspondence. A marked change for the better is everywhere apparent. The cheap literature, illustrated, is another factor in this happy reaction. To these may be added the electric trolley railroads, traversing the country, the cars stopping on call, and the rates within the farmer's ability to pay. How much there is included in the kingdom of Christ, when such means are inspired to uplift humanity!

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Death of the Ameer

NEWS of the death of Abdur Rahman, the Ameer, or King, of Afghanistan, has caused some apprehension in European capitals. His country lies between the territories of Russia, Asia, and the frontier of British India. Russia has long coveted the land, but the late Ameer, supported by

HABIBULLAH KHAN

England, succeeded in keeping it out of the Muscovite clutches. No one appears to know what the young man who will succeed to the throne may do, and there consequently looms up on the horizon a cloud of ominous portent, dark with the possibility of a gigantic struggle between Russia and Great Britain. The deceased potentate was fifty-six years of age. His early years were passed in exile and in battle. His grandfather, Dost Mohammed, who died in 1863, left eighteen sons, and there was a struggle among them for the supreme power. Abdur Rahman fought for his father's cause, but was unsuccessful and was driven from the kingdom. For twelve years he lived miserably in Russian territory. He never, however, abandoned hope, and after a long struggle, he had joy, in 1881, of receiving the homage of all the tribal chiefs and being recognized by England and Russia as the Ameer. Since that time his reign, though troubled one, has been successful. He used to set himself to a goat standing between a bear on the north and a lion on the south. But England wanted a "buffer" state between her own territories and those of Russia, and she aided the Ameer in maintaining his independence. He leaves four sons, the eldest of whom, Habibullah Khan, was carefully trained to be his father's successor. It is reported that one of his brothers aspires to the throne and may head a rebellion. Already hints have been made in St. Petersburg that in the event of civil war, Russia might enter to restore order. As this step would inevitably be resisted by England, there is no little anxiety about the situation. The Afghans have need to pray that God will grant the blessing to their new ruler that Solomon sought for his son:

To give unto the young man knowledge and discretion (Prov. 1:4).

Rare Operation

The life of a fourteen-year-old boy was saved a few days ago by a remarkable operation, performed by the surgeons in a Brooklyn hospital. The patient was suffering from a wound in his foot, resulting from his stepping on a rusty nail, which had entered the sole to the depth of an inch. The foot had been fomented and poulticed, but too late to prevent the mischief affecting the blood. When he was taken to the hospital, his body was rigid, and so drawn that it rested on the back of the head and the heels. The jaws, also, were firmly locked. Various remedies were tried without result, and the surgeons then decided that an operation on the head could alone save the boy's life. A portion of the skull was lifted, and some antitoxin was injected into the brain cavity. The skull was then closed. In a short time the muscles relaxed, and the jaws opened and closed easily. The surgeons believe that the boy will soon be well enough to leave the hospital. To persons unfamiliar with anatomy, it must seem strange that an operation on the head should be resorted to, to remedy a wound in the foot. But the surgeons knew that by reaching the seat of the evil they were doing better than dealing with the local trouble. The same principle is effective in spiritual maladies. A change of heart is the surest way of securing a reform of life.

As he thinketh in his heart, so is he (Prov. 23:7).

Quaint Golden Wedding

A large party, chiefly of German nationality, assembled a few days ago in a house near Sheephead Bay, N. Y., to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the wedding of its owner. They received a warm welcome, and took part in some quaint ceremonies which are common in the part of the Fatherland from which they came. In the course of a speech made by their host in recognition of their congratulations, he narrated his history since his marriage took place in Stuttgart fifty years ago. For some years he had been a sailor. During one of his visits to America he visited some countrymen who lived on Long Island. He asked them why they did not reclaim more land from the sea. They replied that it would not be worth the trouble and expense. The sailor thought otherwise, and at last they agreed that if he would reclaim the land he might have it for his own. He set to work at once, and soon had a dry place of rich soil and erected a snug house on it. Three years ago the owners of the property, perceiving how valuable it had become, ousted the sailor by process of law. He found another place in similar condition which he has reclaimed, and as it is an island at high tide he has built a bridge to it and has built himself a home. But even now, he has built on land which may be claimed by others, and the more he develops it, the more likely it will be that their claim will be enforced. His labor is like that which the sinner does in this life, which inevitably ends in loss and disappointment.

He that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes (Haggai 1:6).

Relics of Ancient Babylon

A cable message from Berlin to the New York Sun, reports a discovery of interest to Bible students as well as antiquarians. It reports that Dr. Koldevey and his party, who are excavating on the site of ancient Baby-found the entire business documents of the Babylonish firm "Egibi & Son"—possibly the oldest house of business of which the world holds record. These documents included unpaid bills, day-books, ledgers, etc. They were made of hardened clay, and the wonder is that they had not crumbled away during the course of the centuries. This discovery shows how literally the prophecies against Babylon have been fulfilled.

Her foundations are fallen; her walls are broken down (Jer. 50:15).

The Missing Link

A new work by Professor Haeckel announces a discovery in Java which will interest scientific men. It is that of a monkey nearer akin to the human race than any hitherto known. It belongs to the gibbon family, but is more intelligent than any yet met with. It never runs on all fours, and when tired it throws itself on the ground with one arm under its head like a child. Its height is about that of a child of six years. It has several cries, but these are so changed by modulation that they represent many emotions. Its gestures resemble the human, and when it has oranges or bananas given to it, it holds them in the left hand and peels them with the right. The natives do not consider the gibbons as animals, but as men, who, on account of extreme wickedness, have been bewitched. In this they libel the poor monkey, though their idea of the effect of wickedness is not far from the truth. It does change a man, but not in outward appearance so much as in the spiritual nature.

What they know naturally as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves (Jude 10).

BRIEF NOTES

There are about 1,000,000 blind people in the world, asserts a statistician. The largest proportion is in Russia, for there nearly 200,000 walk in literal darkness.

Pastors, committees or other parties contemplating a visit to Palestine, Egypt, Asiatic Turkey or any part of the Orient, can learn of a competent and well-recommended guide and linguist by addressing Ephraim Aboosh, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Dr. George F. Pentecost has resigned the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Yonkers, N. Y., to take up missionary work in the Philippine Islands. He expects to start for his new field of labor before the end of this month.

The census returns just published, show that there are still more men than women in the country. The figures are: Males, 39,059,242; females, 37,244,145. The entire population has increased since the census of 1890 by 13,233,631. The foreign-born population number 10,460,085. This is a greater number than in 1890, but a smaller proportion of the whole. The proportion of colored to white population is also slightly smaller than in 1890. The number of colored persons is 8,840,789. The Chinese number 119,050, and the Japanese 85,986.

The new revised version of the Bible, containing the changes of the American revisers incorporated in the text, is favorably reviewed by the English press, which strongly approves the great majority of the changes. Most of the reviewers prefer the American to the English version. The grammatical correction of substituting "who" for "which" in such cases as the opening words of the Lord's Prayer, is alone a great improvement.

Recent visitors to London report that so-called liberal ideas of Sunday observance have worked disastrous results among the poor. The upper and middle classes, instead of going to church on Sunday evening, entertain their friends. The servants, waiters, caterers, etc., have in consequence to work seven days in the week, and Sunday is becoming the busiest day.

The post offices of Europe have been visited by a statistician anxious to learn the relative size of the correspondence of the rulers. He learns that the average daily mail of the Pope is 22,500 letters and newspapers. King Edward VII. comes next, with 3,000 newspapers and 1,000 letters. The Czar and the German Emperor receive each from 600 to 700 letters.

THE LATE AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN

lon, have uncovered walls which they believe to have been part of the palace of Nebuchadnezzar. One of the walls is faced with glazed tiles, which seem to have wonderfully withstood the ravages of time, and are artistically ornamented with flowers and tracery. In the courtyard near the wall were also found several bricks, evidently part of a mosaic pavement, the design of which was composed of enamels and glass-raised work. Among their other finds in the courtyard were coffins, coins, stone utensils, and fragments of stone inscriptions. Dr. Koldevey considers the recent finds as fully proving that this part of the city contained the finest of the Babylonian palaces, doubtless, that of Nebuchadnezzar. Meanwhile, excavations are being carried on in the business quarter of Old Babylon, where the Arabs

THE CITY OF WUHU, CHINA, WHERE GREAT LOSS HAS BEEN SUSTAINED BY THE FLOODS IN THE YANGTZE RIVER

Thousands · Perish · in · China's · Great · Flood

BY the latest mails from China, details have been received of the disastrous inundation in the Yangtze Valley, by which many thousands perished. No calamity of the like magnitude, says the North China Gazette, has been seen there for three-quarters of a century. Breaking down over the lowlands with a vast onrush, the Yangtze River swept everything before it—crops, trees, houses, and even soil, and countless human lives were engulfed by the swollen waters. Hupeh, above Hankow, is largely valley, and that section of the province is an unbroken lake. Junks sail over the ruined rice fields. Northern Hunan is also largely under water, and so also is Kiangsi. Boats can sail over the tops of the tallest trees. In many places where the water is not so deep, natives may be seen paddling about in tubs, for the want of boats. The survivors will have a terribly hard struggle for existence. They have no seed for second planting.

A correspondent, who has made a tour of the flooded districts in one portion of the Yangtze Valley, writes to a Shanghai paper that thousands of homes are totally wrecked, with probably an equal number of lives lost, while tens of thousands have lost home, crops, and all property capable of destruction. Immense farming districts on either side of the river are overflowed. In some places the water has extended inland 100 miles. Below Nganking an immense dyke that protected a large plain broke, and swept away thousands of homes and destroyed growing crops. The survivors put up straw huts, or with boats took away the remnants of their possessions. The houses, built of mud dissolved and sunk out of sight. Here could be seen a whole village with roofs just out of water, or possibly the temple walls still standing, all the rest of the village having disappeared. Some small Chinese war-boats have assisted a few to escape with their lives, while many more piratical crews have been doing just the opposite. Dead bodies float down the great river, and no one seems to care. The Hsiakuan city outside of Nanking was so flooded that boats went everywhere through its streets. Parts of Nanking itself were under water, and people had to leave their homes and camp for the time on higher land. This scene is repeated all along the river at Wuhu, Nganking and Kiukiang. At the former place the city front presents the appearance of a city on rafts. Large river steamers have been washed up and stranded in fields or on sand-bars. Around Wuhu, the hills are crowded with fugitives, and many have perished. Miss Emma Mitchell, of the M. E. Mission, has opened a soup kitchen, and is doing excellent work among the women and children.

Rev. Mr. Beals, an American missionary to China, now visiting this country, has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the interesting photograph of the Yangtze River at Wuhu, which appears on this page. The present flood extends back of Wuhu fully one hundred miles into the interior, reaching the large cities of Nansing and Ning-kueh-fu. Mission houses have been flooded as well as native houses. The damage is widespread and overwhelming.

As already stated in cablegrams to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, active relief work has already been begun, a local committee in Shanghai, and a great deal of good has been accomplished in the Yangtze Valley among the destitute population. Rev. Arthur H. Smith and associates on the China Famine Relief Committee are co-operating with the Shanghai Committee, and have turned over for their use among the flood sufferers an unexpended balance of famine moneys in their hands.

Human Flesh on Sale in Shensi

An Associated Press despatch from Tacoma, Wash., Oct. 7th, says: "The steamship Glenogle brings news of human flesh being publicly sold in the famine districts of Shensi, China. Babies and young children are being butchered. The Empress Dowager has commanded that the practice be stopped, but is unable to enforce orders only around Hsian Fu (the capital)."

"The money collected by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been distributed, saving many from starvation."

Mr. F. H. Nichols, the correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has arrived in China, and is now probably on his way to Shensi. He cables the news that the famine is practically at an end, except in that province, and that 50,000 are destitute at Singan (the capital). Through the good offices of United States Minister Conger, our correspondent has been provided with an armed escort, so that on the perilous journey to Singan he will be amply protected. His letters will describe actual conditions in the afflicted province.

THE WORLD'S FINEST SUBWAY

THE annual increase of travel on the street railways of New York for the past ten years has been not less than ten million passengers!

With every improvement in service, there has been corresponding enlargement in the number of those seeking transportation. H. H. Vreeland, President of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, and George J. Gould, President of the Manhattan Railway Company, express themselves as of one mind with the Rapid Transit Commission, which has the Subway in hand, in believing that the construction of the latter will enhance rather than detract from the usefulness of existing means of travel. The surface and elevated lines are congested to an almost intolerable degree at certain hours of the day. Any relief of this condition will attract to these roads many people who now walk or stay at home rather than sit or stand in crowded cars. "As you make ways of travel pleasant, more people travel," say authorities. One is told, too, that the Subway will contribute to the social, moral and religious life of the city. Thus, during church-going hours, most cars now are packed with people, numbers of whom must stand. Doubtless, many fragile women and tired, half-sick men, who now forego attendance on worship because they feel that they cannot pay the physical tax that may be involved, will avail themselves of the privilege when the Subway makes room for all. To illustrate the influence which may be exerted on social intercourse, one may quote Harlem folks, who say: "Perhaps we can renew acquaintance with friends living down town or across the Bridge in Brooklyn, when the Subway comes." It is not too much to hope that congested sections may be relieved to a considerable extent and the home-life of the city affected for the better. Many people quartered in thickly settled districts will, under new conditions, have dwellings of their own in the suburbs, from which they can reach their places of business in comfort and on time.

The street cars of Greater New York carried in 1900 1,067,790,275 passengers, Manhattan cars alone transporting 717,256,224. In 1884, all Manhattan lines carried 350,000,000. Less than fifty years ago there were four railroads here, carrying 18,500,000; five years later, there were six, carrying 36,500,000. In 1746, the ox-cart, was the only means of public conveyance; then came the "busses"; next the stage coaches, which are now run on Fifth Avenue, and which were on Broadway until after A. T. Stewart's death, in 1876, Mr. Stewart and other prominent men opposing the construction of a railroad on Broadway on the ground that it would simply be the ruination of everything! New York gave the idea of the horse car to the world, and the world's first street railway was chartered here in 1831.

In many respects the subway will be the best underground road ever constructed. It will be clean, light and dry; in marked contrast to the London tunnel, which will be near the surface for a greater part of its length. At Fort George, however, it will be nearly 150 feet deep, and at the One Hundred and Eighty-first street station, 100 feet. Where the track is more than thirty feet from the surface, elevators will be provided. Passengers will hardly realize for much of the way that they are underground. The roof will be flat, and wherever possible, will admit the rays of the sun. Where artificial light is used effort will be made to render the illumination as nearly as possible like that of daylight. As electricity is the only power to be employed, there will be no smoke or dust. Ventilation will be first-class. Floors will be of cement; walls and ceilings of concrete. Supports and framework are of steel. Stations will be roomy, concrete platforms, with walls of glazed enamel, or of glass tile, some warm neutral tint. Electric lights will be at frequent intervals.

J. B. McDONALD

ENGINEERS PARSON AND DYER INSPECTING WORK

The term "tunnel" does not fit to describe the road its entire length for in certain sections to the extreme north, it will be a viaduct, elevated structure. It will be twenty-one miles long, beginning at a loop around the Post Office, extending in four tracks (two express, two local) to Ninety-sixth street; the dividing into two branches (of two tracks each) one of which, the West Side Line, will run to Spuyten Duyvil Creek; the other, the East Side Line, to Bronx Park. From the loop to One Hundred and Fourth street will be fourteen minutes by express to either terminal in thirty minutes. There will be forty-eight stations. Contractors expect to finish the road before the date set in the contract—September, 1904. If so, the like the big tunnel itself, will be something unique in construction. The first ground was broken Mar

Orr; William Barclay Parsons is Chief Engineer, John B. McDonald is the contractor. August Belmont is President of the Rapid

Transit Subway Construction Co., the Engineer in Chief is S. L. F. Deyo, and the General Manager E. P. Bryan. The road will cost $35,000,000; it belongs to the city. About eight thousand men are employed in the work, which goes on night and day, with eight-hour shifts, Sunday being excepted. Besides these eight thousand in the city, thousands outside are finding employment in the Rapid Transit work. In iron and coal mines, cement shops, steel mills, forest, and lumberyards, labor contributes in various ways to the construction of the new tunnel, which, when complete, will be one of the century's greatest engineering triumphs.

Manliness is Christlikeness * Death of Joseph

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 3.
GENESIS 50: 15-26

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT: -- SO TEACH US TO NUMBER OUR DAYS THAT WE MAY APPLY OUR HEARTS UNTO WISDOM. PSA. 90: 12:

WHEN Pharaoh, the King of Egypt, was told that Joseph's brothers had come, it pleased him well, and out of the generous impulses of his heart he proposed to Joseph that his father and brothers, and their families, should come to live in Egypt, and that they should be given the best of everything. He said: "Send wagons in which the mothers and the little ones shall ride. And see to it that both food and clothing are given to your brothers for themselves and their families, so that they may have plenty on their journey." Joseph was made glad by the king's kindness, and he got all things ready, as the king had said, and from his own riches he sent a present to his old father of nuts and wheat and meat, the best to be found in all Egypt.

But the old father was slow to believe the good news which his sons brought him, that Joseph was yet alive, and was the lord of Egypt. But when he saw the Egyptian wagons and the treasures they held, he could no longer doubt, for these were proofs at once of love and power, and he said: "It is enough; Joseph, my son, is yet alive. I will go and see him before I die." And ere long Jacob and his sons, their wives, and children, were on their way, seventy leading persons with their families and servants. The Lord God himself met them on the way, and said to Israel: "Fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will make of thee a great nation. I will go down with thee into Egypt, and I will also surely bring thee up again." And so the aged traveler, one hundred and thirty years old, was cheered upon his way. He knew of a certainty that he was doing the right thing.

Joseph got his royal chariot ready, and went out to meet his father. So thrilled, so gratified was the father to see his long-lost, well-beloved son, that he exclaimed: "Now, let me die, since I have seen thy face." But Jacob lived for seventeen years after that to enjoy his restored son, and to rejoice in his exalted position. Joseph speedily presented his father to the king. The hoary head, which is a crown of glory, took precedence of the crown of Egypt, and Pharaoh bowed his head to receive the old man's blessing.

After this, the kinsmen of Joseph were located in the best part of Egypt, in the land of Rameses, a Goshen is called, and until the five remaining years of famine were passed they were nourished by Joseph at the king's request. The famine in Egypt became so sore that people paid all of their money for food, then they gave their land in payment of it, and then they sold themselves as slaves to Pharaoh.

When Jacob grew to be one hundred and forty-seven years old, he died; his dying words were blessings upon the two sons of Joseph: "The angel which redeemed me from all evil bless the lads." And what a funeral Joseph gave his father! First, there was an embalming of his body, and then universal mourning for forty days through Egypt, and then a funeral cortege back to Jacob's home, which was enhanced by the glory and pomp of Egypt, for all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house and the wise men of Egypt participated in it. And Jacob was laid in the cave of Machpelah, the family tomb of Jacob's grandfather, Abraham. And what did Joseph encounter on his return to Egypt? The craven fear of his brothers, who were so small-souled that they could not understand Joseph's full and free forgiveness. They thought his forgiveness would last only during the lifetime of their father. Joseph shed bitter tears to be so misunderstood, as he looked upon them prostrated before him. He did not chide them for their distrust, but reassured them with promises of continued support and kindness. If it is so hard for mean men to understand a great and noble man, how infinitely more difficult is it for even the best men to understand God.

Joseph sealed his promises with a strange seal, even with his bones, for he said, "When God shall fulfil his promise of bringing you back to your own land, ye shall carry up my bones from hence." And Joseph died a hundred and ten years old. More than two hundred and forty years afterward, Moses took the bones of Joseph with him when he led Israel from Egypt to the Land of Promise.

The death of rulers! What a varied history the record would make even if we should survey but one land or one century! For instance, our own Presidents from Washington to McKinley. And may our new President be as noble and useful to the world as was Joseph, and be Christ-like, Christian in deed as well as word.

Illustration and Application

Death always calls for a review of life. Joseph's is the first life given in the Bible that can be set up as a pattern. Other Genesis saints, as we have said, were "good for their age," but Joseph was good for any age. Howbeit, his corner in gram suggests that he was human. But for that error, which may have been of the head rather than the heart, we might think he was only a story-book ideal. Though not faultless, he is one of the noblest examples of the manliness of Godliness. What is manliness but to be a man in the fullest sense, to be all that man was made to be when he was created in the "image of God?" To be manly is therefore to be Godlike or Godly, "the image of God," which is, to be Christlike or Christian.

Let us note how many ways Joseph was like Jesus, when the great exemplar had not yet come to dwell on earth, and when even the beginning of the Bible had not been written; and consider how much more Christlike we ought to be with the life of Jesus before us, and the whole Bible in our hands.

Joseph, like Jesus, was a "beloved son," more loved than his brothers because purer. And let all children remember that is the beginning of manliness, Godliness, Christlikeness, to be a pure and dutiful child at home, as Joseph was, as Jesus was.

A missionary lady had a little Hindu orphan named Shadi living with her. She had taught him about Jesus, and one night, when he was six years old, she said to him, "Now, pray a little prayer of your own." And what do you think Shadi's prayer was? It was a good prayer for any little child to make, for it was this: "Dear Jesus, make me like what you were when you were six years old."

Little Mary had given her heart to Christ. She wanted very much to show that she loved him, but there seemed to be nothing she could do. "You might thread grandmother's needles," said mother. "Her eyes are so dim that she cannot do it herself, and I know she would like to find a half-dozen needles threaded and ready for use every day on her cushion." "But would that be serving Jesus?" asked Mary. "Yes, it would be a helping hand held out to one of his very dear ones. Jesus would regard that as done to himself."

Joseph, like Jesus, was sent by his father to bear loving messages and gifts to his far-off brothers. We, too, should be Christlike in bearing to our sinful brothers God's messages of pardon and his "unspeakable gift." When life is ending the memories of such messages will outshine all other words we have spoken. During Mr. Moody's last journey home from Kansas City, the train was delayed by an accident to the engine, and much time was lost west of Detroit. As they were leaving that city the new engineer sent back to find out if it were true that D. L. Moody was ill on the train. Learning that he was, the engineer sent word, "Tell Mr. Moody that I will do my best to make up lost time. All I am I owe to him. He led me to Christ twenty years ago." The train ran the next 127 miles in as many minutes.

Joseph, like Jesus, "came unto his own and his own received him not." Are we not like those who rejected the Father's message and messenger? Let us rather be like Joseph and Jesus in that they did not give up those who at first rejected the message.

THE TRADITIONAL TOMB OF JOSEPH

Joseph, like Jesus, was sold for silver. Let us beware lest our likeness be to those who sold a brother, aye, a Christ, for greed. If we have suffered indeed from human greed and hate, let us, like Jesus and Joseph, give no place to despondency or revenge, but trust the Providence that makes the wrath and envy and greed of man to praise him and serve us.

Stay firm. Let not the future,
Though dim and drear,
Fill thee with dread foreboding
And anxious fear.
'Tis only thine to follow
Where he shall lead:
Thy Shepherd King provideth
For every need.

Joseph, like Jesus, had "anguish of soul." Let us not shrink from following Christ even to Gethsemane, when the deliverance we plead for is not God's will.

I thank thee, Lord, for mine unanswered prayers,
Unanswered save thy quiet, kindly "Nay";
Yet it seemed hard among my heavy cares
That bitter day.

I wanted joy; but thou didst know for me
That sorrow was the gift I needed most,
And in its mystic depths I learned to see
The Holy Ghost

—OLIVER HUCKEL.

Jesus "took the form of a servant" voluntarily, as Joseph that of a slave involuntarily. The lowliest toilers, therefore, should be first to welcome the Divine Carpenter.

AN EGYPTIAN MUMMY AND MUMMY CASE

I think the King of that country comes out from among his tired host,

And walks in this world of the weary, as if he loved it the most—
For here in the dusty confusion, with eyes that are heavy and dim,
He meets again the laboring men who are looking and longing for him.

He cancels the curse of Eden, and brings them a blessing instead.
Blessed are they that labor, for Jesus partakes of their bread.
He puts his hand to their burdens, he enters their homes at night,
Who does his best shall have as guest the Master of life and light.

This is the gospel of labor—ring it ye bells of the kirk—
The Lord of love came down from above, to live with the men of work.

This is the rose that he planted here in the thorn-cursed soil—
Heaven is blest with perfect rest, but the blessing of earth is toil.

—HENRY VAN DYKE

Joseph, like Jesus, was tempted, but yielded not. His wife to Potiphar's wife might well be the motto of the White Cross movement. "How shall I do this great wickedness, and against God?"

"While traveling in a coal-mine district," says Dr. Cuyler,

"I noticed how very dingy the town appeared. The coal dust seemed to black buildings, trees, shrubs, everything. But the foreman and I were walking near a mine, I noticed a beautiful white flower in a daisy field. 'What care the owner this plant must take of it,' I said, 'to keep it so free from dust and dirt!' 'See he said the foreman, and taking up a handful of coal dust, threw it over the flower. It immediately fell off, and left the flower as stainless as before. 'It has an enamel the foreman explained, 'which prevents a dust from clinging to it. I think it may have been created for just such a place. A Christian spirit, in which Christ has purified the very depths of desire, will thus throw off every foul thought.'"

Joseph, like Jesus, was a prophet. I cannot interpret dreams that tell the future of men and nations, but "every one who received a word from God, and speaks without a lisp is a prophet," and shall in time, if not foretell, the future.

Joseph, like Jesus, was put with criminals. The butler and baker recall the two thieves one penitent, the other impenitent, that were crucified with Christ. Joseph had suffered yet more keenly than he did in prison when his own brothers cast him into the pit to die. In any wrong we have done a fellow man, even by neglect, we have not only wronged a brother, but him also who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

So shall all speech of now and of to-morrow
All he hath shown me or shall show me yet
Spring from an infinite and tender sorrow,
Burst from a burning passion of regret.

Joseph, like Jesus, forgave his enemies. It is ever the nobler way, as may be seen from the following story. Richard Morton and Samuel Whitfield were well-to-do farmers who lived on adjoining tracts of land. One morning in the summer, Richard saw his neighbor coming slowly up a lane near the house, seemingly in search of something, and hastened out to meet him. "Good-morning, neighbor Whitfield," was his salutation; "your gray horse you're looking for, is it? Well, then, listen to me. I caught the beast yesterday evening wandering the lane close to the gate of my clover pasture. I thought myself: 'He'll push his way inside next.' So I shut him in the pound, and told the village constable. You can get him out whenever you are willing to pay the fine, but I give you fair warning that I shall always do the same when I find your horse loose in the lane." Samuel Whitfield's answer was a very quiet one. "Listen to me now, Richard. The morning from my window I saw your cows stamping in the garden. I ran downstairs, turned them out, and drove them to your yard, carefully shutting them in and fastening the gate. And look you, friend, I give you fair warning. I shall do the same thing if I ever find those cows straying again."

Is there any question which course was meanness, and which was manliness and Godliness—Godlikeness? "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

Joseph, like Jesus, was delivered from humiliation in lordship; gave the bread of life to the nations; and forgiveness even, and invited the most unworthy who had repented and received forgiveness to come and dwell with him in the best land.

With thee, O Lord, in lands of light,
With thee, O Lord, in lands of might,
Or with thee in Gethsemane,
But more than all, with thee.

THE WEDDING SEASON

THE beautiful autumnal days are chosen by many young people for the most important crisis of their lives—the honeymoon. Through October and November we hear the merry chime of marriage bells, the sweet strains of the wedding march, and each bride, in her adornment of white gown and veil, receives our homage. A church wedding attracts a strong, often of those little acquainted with either bride or groom, for there is a touch of nature that makes the whole world akin, and it thrills at the mention of a wedding. See the lovely procession coming down the aisle—the ushers, the flower-girls, the maids of honor, the fair maiden who is the centre of everything, on her mother's arm, following her mother, whose heart on this occasion is beating with very mingled sensations, partly joyful, partly sad. At the altar they meet the bridegroom with his best man, waiting for them, and the minister steps forward, and presently, in a very short space, the solemn words are said that make the friends husband and wife, or a contract which is so binding, and which is to last for a whole life, the marriage ceremony is very brief. We step up with congratulations, then the pair reach their home, and we watch with interest the respective mothers, to both of whom this wedding is fraught with such deep solicitude. Any needless jest and witticism are aimed at the mother-in-law, foolishly, as a rule, for she is usually disposed to be a very good and kind friend to the new son or daughter, which the marriage has given her. If she is wise, she will carefully avoid offering advice to the young couple. They must be left to themselves during the first year of their union, to make their own decisions, to endure the consequences of their own mistakes. No stranger, least of all a relative-in-law, should intermeddle with the two whom love has joined in one. As they set out on the wedding journey, or for the new home, the path looks very bright. God helping them, it will never lead through shadow that his sunlight cannot scatter. When the new homes of this autumn are founded, whether farmhouse or city flat, log cabin or mansion, in small or large towns, in obscurity or in conspicuous place, they will give the best chance for true happiness if the fear of God and the love of God are in them. Begin right, dear young people. Read and pray together, and build your family altar from the first. Ask a blessing on your first meal. Whatever else is omitted in your home life, let religion, pure and undefiled, have prominence there, and the pains very soon to have a church home, too. The ability of this Republic depends on the purity and ety of its simple homes.

Comfort One Another

Comfort one another,
For the way is growing dreary,
The feet are often weary,
And the heart is very sad.

What is the sorrow, friend, that is clouding your face and dimming your eyes, and taking the life from your step? Is it grief for a dear one gone—for mother, for sister, for child? Do you miss the little endearing one who used to clutter the house with his toys, and run in with a shout, and clasp wee dimpled hands around your neck? Oh, how the heart aches for little Boy Blue! No human hand is soft enough to be pressed upon that burning spot in your heart. No earthly love can help you to be cheerful. But One there is, in the skies, who can assuage your grief and dry your tears. One walked through the garden of lies, and gathered yours; yours, but his too, and he has transplanted it into the sweet fields beyond the swelling flood. And one day he will send for you, and you will find your lost flower in his care.

A Golden Wedding

After fifty years! Gone are the brown locks, the rose bloom, the slim, straight shape, the bright and effervescent pride of youth. But maturity may be beautiful, and age does not always mean weakness. The other day, on Long Island, an aged beach-comber and his wife, both Germans, celebrated their golden wedding. Their home is a little house, built by their own hands, of driftwood tossed in by the waves. They are poor, but two happier people it would be hard to find. When the tide comes in, their home is surrounded by water, but they rather like that, and their friends and neighbors managed to eat a plentiful supper on the day of the golden wedding in that tiny home. "No gold here," said the sturdy old husband, "except the golden opinions of our neighbors." He might have added, "And the pure gold of honest hearts, tried through a long life."

INTERIOR OF AN INDIAN HOUSE, YAKUTAT BAY, ALASKA

NEVER MIND THE TROUBLE

NEVER mind the trouble, mother,
That the little ones may bring,
They who lately flown from heaven,
On some guardian angel's wing,
Came to clasp you, came to love you,
Came with messages that bless,
Came to lead your heart world-hardened
Back to peace and righteousness.

Never mind the trouble, mother,
Made by restless little hands;
Be not hasty to reprove them,
Nor to weary with commands.
Make them not repent their coming
From their pure, celestial joys;
O, be cheerful, glad and grateful
Mid their frolic, fun and noise.

Never mind the trouble, mother,
Nor that patience is required
For the oft repeated cares, when
Feet and hands and heart grow tired.
There is blessed compensation
In fair childhood's dimpling charms,
In dear eyes where heaven is smiling,
In the clasp of loving arms.

MRS. FRANK A. BRECK.

With the Indians in Alaska

WHEN we grow discontented, as we sometimes do, with our own environment; annoyed because the old shades are faded, and we cannot afford new ones; the carpets shabby, and the purse too flat to replace them with finer and more modish fabrics; when we compare ourselves with our neighbors and are vexed that their splendor surpasses our own, we may find a tonic in making a pilgrimage to an Alaskan home. The red man in Alaska, living with primitive simplicity, is satisfied with a fire on the hearth, even if it burn in a smoky chimney and the low roof is blackened with its soot. He asks for no luxurious easy chairs. A bench running around the walls of the living room fills his ideal of comfort. Thick clothing is a must-be, and he and his family are fortunate if they are swathed in thick woollens, or furnished with skins. The spoils of his hunting and trapping must bring what money he requires, and at all times pelts may be seen drying from poles and bars propped up against the ceiling. Outdoors, the Indian condescends to hunt and fish, but within his home he is an autocrat, living in lazy inertia, and waited upon, hand and foot, by his womankind. To the children he is not unkind, and they grow up around him, as bears cubs in the den. It is hard to be sick in such a home as the one our artist has photographed, and as there is very little of tender ministry or patient care-taking, those who are too ill to rally under Nature's handling, usually die, and are little mourned. Gentleness and sympathy are qualities which come from Christian civilization.

Much missionary work is being done in Alaska, and schools are being established for the little ones. A generation hence, an Alaskan house, even among the Indians, will be far more comfortable than those we see now. And then, who knows, the squaw may feel as we do about her carpets and her curtains!

The Fall Cleaning

With the advent of cool weather, and in the pleasant interval before stoves are put up, and furnaces started, the housekeeper's thoughts turn to her autumnal cleaning. The house may have been cleaned in the spring, but the summer dust has sifted into crannies and corners, and it needs going over again. Many women prefer to take up carpets in the fall and to do whatever painting and papering may then be necessary, so that the home may be inviting, and present that air of being in good order which is pleasing to right-minded housekeepers. The masculine mind seldom appreciates the need for this thoroughness on the part of the women, and yet, scientific discovery marches along the old time-honored path, and we are persuaded that she who would keep from her door diphtheria and typhoid, and have her olive branches strong and sturdy around her table, must make frequent war upon germs and microbes, and this she can do only by the most rigid cleanliness. The notable housewife does not upset the whole house at once. She cleans one room at a time, beginning at the top of the house, and omitting nothing, so that when she gets through with all her domestic labor, the whole house is "clean as a whistle."

After the process is over, it is well for her if she, the house-mother, take a prudent thought for herself. If ever she is in want of a good rest, it is now, in autumn. A visit to her sister or mother, whom she has not lately seen; a drive over the hills with her husband; a few days of taking life with ease, and letting somebody else bear the daily burdens, may add years to her useful career, and make her a happier comrade on the road for her dear ones.

BRIGHTER DAYS in the PHILIPPINES

THE RAPID PACIFICATION OF THE ISLANDS OPENS THE WAY FOR THE GOSPEL

ON SKIRMISH LINE, SAN MATEO, LUZON

TRAINED NURSES' QUARTERS

ENTRANCE TO LEPER HOSPITAL, MANILA

ALTHOUGH the crack of the rifle and the roar of the field-gun are still heard in remote parts of the Philippines, where isolated bands are still in arms against the American government, the greater part of the archipelago is at peace. Our correspondents in Manila and at other points write hopefully of the outlook for religious work.

Writing from the town of Bacolod, in Negros, Mr. W. F. Norris says:

Bacolod, the provincial capital of Occidental Negros, is very prettily situated, overlooking the sea. Passengers arriving at low tide are transported ashore in a caribou cart, or, as sometimes happens, on the backs of natives. The vegetation here is more tropical in appearance than in Manila. From the windows of my room are visible coconut trees and bamboo, both of which grow taller than the species I have seen in Luzon.

There is no Protestant religious organization in Bacolod, and I think none in the island, excepting the Institute at Dumaguete. This institution is under the management of Rev. Mr. Hibbard, of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Hibbard was stationed at Manila for a time, where, in conjunction with Rev. James B. Rodgers, he was engaged in missionary work and also conducting religious services on Sundays in the Presbyterian chapel. Both are men full of zeal, and under whose wise and prudent administration no needless cause of offense will be given to the sensibilities of the various classes, nationalities and races of this diversified people.

The death of Rev. Mr. Davidson (already mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) was a great loss to religious work in the Philippines.

The Y. M. C. A. have a branch establishment at Iloilo, twenty-seven miles distant in the Island of Panay. This institution is doing most effective work in the archipelago. It may be doubted whether since its organization the Y. M. C. A. has done greater good than during the past two years in this part of the world. Its messages of cheer in the shape of books, papers and periodicals, follow wherever the soldiers go, and in the places where there are considerable garrisons, as at Manila, Iloilo and Cavite, rooms are fitted up where the men so disposed can congregate and indulge in games, read and write, and find a home. The Y. M. C. A. rooms afford the only place of recreation outside the saloon. I wish the American patrons of the Y. M. C. A. in Manila could see the eagerness with which the "soldier boys" gather at the evening entertainments. The value of the benefaction is the greater owing to the fact that, deprived of the Association rooms, the boys who gather there would be in a moral sense homeless, in any town of the archipelago. Nor are the gift and giver unappreciated. In speech or lecture, the utterance of the name of Miss Helen Gould always elicits a cheer. Hers is the most popular name, among the enlisted men, of the United States Army.

This island of Negros has enjoyed almost complete immunity from hostilities during the insurrection. A civil government, under the United States authority, was established by General Otis over two years ago, at the request of the inhabitants. With the exception of depredations committed on sugar estates in certain localities, the island has escaped the ravages of war, and, as a consequence, is in a more prosperous condition than most other sections. It is naturally a very rich island—the richest of the group. The chief crop is sugar, of which it produces large quantities. There are no seaports and no large towns, the city of Iloilo, on the island of Panay, being the foreign port for the sugar producers of Occidental Negros.

There is, or was, a peculiar sect, called Babalaynes, living in this island, but death or desertion has so brutal sport which, in the days of Spanish rule, constituted the chief pastime of the people of Manila. Mi Condict has a fair-sized and intensely interested audience, and the old pit, which formerly echoed the shout and oaths of the excited Filipinos over their favorite sport, now resounds with the songs of salvation. Another photograph represents the same missionary as worker among the convicts of the public prison, where she is visiting for the purpose of distributing tracts and Gospels. Among our other illustrations on this page a picture of the leper hospital in Manila. It is three miles from the centre of the city and has one hundred and fifteen inmates, who do a certain amount of manual labor in farm gardening.

mounted guard, stationed at each entrance, prevents the lepers from escaping to the outside world. Still other photographs show the trained nurses' quarters in Manila and a party of American troops on the skirmish line at San Mateo, Luzon island.

MISS CONDUCT DELIVERING TRACTS AND GOSPELS TO PRISONERS IN THE MANILA JAIL

thinned their ranks, that only a mere handful now remains. They appear to have been a political as well as a religious body. Their chief object being a redistribution of the land. To this end, they aimed at the destruction of the large sugar estates, trusting that from the chaos thus produced, a reapportionment of the lands would be made, giving to every poor man his small farm. To effect this object seems to have been the design of the bands before referred to as descending from the mountains and ravaging the plantations. Whatever his crimes may be, and in whatever light he may be viewed by the law-abiding element, I have an idea that by his followers the leader of the Babalaynes is regarded as a sort of modern Robin Hood or Philippeno Gracchi.

Another correspondent in the Philippines, Miss Alice Condict, of Manila, writes encouragingly of the progress of evangelical work in that section. She has forwarded two interesting photographs. That on the first page of this issue shows a religious service in progress in a public cockpit—a place formerly devoted to the Secwana liquors, and then it was that the dispute ceased. There were also many chieftains, my younger brothers, who liked drink very much; but I persuaded them to leave it alone. In 1895, however, one of my people began to make beer to drink in my town. I went and called him, and asked him how he came to bring drink into my town. But my younger brothers, whom I induced to refrain from drinking liquor, began to defend him strongly, and fought me, refusing all my overtures. Then the quarrel began in earnest. You can ask all those who drew away a portion of my town from me by means of drink, whether they have lived together. Their towns are scattered where they went to reside. As for me, I do govern. I have people; I have a country. But you, where are your lands? O, ye righteous chief. You who have preserved your towns by means of drink. Have you any people? Or have you any countries? Answer me! I hear, I govern. And they who say that I have destroyed my town on account of my hatred to drink, let them sign their names, so that I may know who they are. How I shall rejoice if you speak right.

A Temperance Lesson

Chief Khama, of the Bamangwato tribe, South Africa, who is now known as one of the most progressive native rulers in the country, was not always potentate of order and progress. In a recent letter to the Bechuanaland News the aged chief tells how his country was ruined by the drink traffic. He writes:

"In the older days we were given to liquor, and there was great destruction among us. By giving heed to the matter, I found that the drink was the beginning of the destruction. And in 1876 I forbade European liquor in my town; but the destruction and the disputes did not cease. In 1876 I forbade

A Letter that Brought Light

THE STORY OF THE CONVERSION OF JOHN McNEILL, THE GREAT SCOTCH PREACHER AND EVANGELIST

...BY...
REV. LOUIS
ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

FEW living men have stirred the world more by their ministry than John McNeill. It is interesting to know how he found the Lord. He had been brought up in a Scotch Presbyterian home, and was therefore well instructed in the Bible, and in all the outward knowledge that clusters about Christianity, yet he had grown to be a young man before he came to know Christ as his Saviour. During all of his boyhood, he had expected that when he got older he would, as a matter of course, join the church and become a Christian; but time passed on, and the great act did not transpire. He knew that his father and mother greatly desired his conversion, and he felt that it was his duty to confess Christ, yet he did not see the way clear.

In his perplexity, young McNeill took a wise course. He wrote to his pastor—that is, the pastor of his father and mother—beginning his letter in this way; quoting from the 16th Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles:—

"And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken; and immediately all the doors were opened, and every one's bands were loosed. And the keeper of the prison, awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled. But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying: Do thyself no harm, for we are all here. Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas, and brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved? And they said, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." "And now," continued John McNeill, in his letter to the old Scotch minister, "Minister, I believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, all about Jesus, and all the Bible says of sin and salvation, and heaven and hell. I believe all about it, but I don't feel one bit the better. There is something wrong." He signed his name to that, and sent the letter away.

Two or three days afterward he was just going to throw open the booking-office window to sell the tickets for the 10:30 Sugar-Brokers' Train to Glasgow, when he saw the postman coming around. He gave John a letter. He glanced at the post-mark, and knew the minister's handwriting. He will never forget the reading of that letter. It said:

"You will never know, unless you should become a minister yourself, how glad I am to get a frank, open, honest letter from you about your spiritual condition, even although evidently you are all in the dark. I am glad you have taken Acts 16: 31 as a challenge text. It says: 'Believe,' in your heart, of course, as you believe in your mother, your wife, for it is faith, not in a proposition of Euclid, but believe, have full confidence in, the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. But, John, you say you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, but don't feel a bit the better of it. Now, I want to know which I am to believe about you? Am I to believe yourself saying, 'I don't feel a bit the better,' or am I to believe God uttering his verdict on you in the Word that can never lie—God saying that the man who believes in the Lord Jesus Christ is, and shall be, eternally saved."

McNeill says that he saw in a moment that he had made the mistake of checking all God's Word by his feelings, and reducing all God's Word, no matter what it said, to the level of his feelings. He now saw that that was no faith at all. But the minister clenched it when he said: "John, you would quote the text as if it read, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will feel easier,' instead of 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' God says it. Never mind your feelings."

That explanation lifted the curtain from around the young man's mind and heart, and he saw the spiritual regions stand out bold and clear. There was no great feeling even then. It was a case of seeing. What the eyes are to the body, faith is to the soul. He was saved. He didn't shout. He took a walk in the station along to the far end of the platform. He said to himself, "Has the station been white-washed?" The very dingy brick walls, all covered with smoke and soot from the engines, looked whiter. It was not the walls, it was his own mind and heart that were brightened.

After a little, he went back and sold the tickets and said nothing about it. Next morning when he woke up, the devil whispered to him, "It's all a hoax." But McNeill said stoutly, "Has God's Word altered through the night?" He looked up Acts 16: 31 and found it just the same, so he went on resting his heart on God's Word, and so continues until this day.

Old Folks' Day

The recent celebration of "Old Folks' Day" in the Presbyterian Church, Vineland, N. J., was a very interesting event. The pastor, Rev. Dr. David H. King, conducted the services. There were present more than twenty people over eighty; fifty over seventy, and two one hundred years old. The last two were Mr. James Green, who counts an even century, and Mr. March Lamb, who proudly claims 104. Mr. Green looks, if anything, more venerable than the age he names. He has a good memory; recalls voting for Andrew Jackson in 1828, and has a faint recollection of casting a vote for President four years before that. The unique anniversary of "Old Folks' Day" was instituted in the Vineland church in 1890. Since then, it has grown in interest and the attendance in numbers.

A Temperance Leader Gone

In the death of Rev. A. P. Sturgess, the temperance cause lost a worker, who will long be missed. The circumstances of his death, as will be remembered, were very sad. He and his wife were among the victims of a recent railroad tragedy near Newark, N. J., which left vacant chairs in many homes. Dr. Sturgess was born in Litchfield, New York, sixty-five years ago. His father was a preacher, and he early felt that he must follow the same high calling. During his labors as a pastor, he became deeply interested in temperance work, and among other activities conducted a temperance weekly in Boston. In 1900, he became Superintendent of the Syracuse District of the Anti-Saloon League. He was considered one of the best speakers of the League. The double funeral of himself and wife was held in the Parke Presbyterian Church, Newark, where he had served as pastor for twenty-six years.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Triumphs of the Cross

BY REV. A. C. DIXON, D.D.

THE power of the Bible confirms the proposition that it is a revelation from God. It is the living Word. God's heart throbs in it, and his arm is felt in every chapter. It transforms character; it comforts in sorrow; it helps men to live and to die. It makes a revolution such as no book of human authorship has done. Pastor Hirsch says that in his parish visitation he gave a Bible to a seller of low literature. At first she refused it, and, when she consented to accept it, she said, "I will sell it." "All right," replied Mr. Hirsch, "but read it before you sell it." When he returned to that book-store several months afterward, he found that all the low literature had been cast out. The woman, who had never read the Bible before, was so impressed with its truths, and her character was so changed, that she decided to run only a first-class book-store. The Bible thus cleanses and keeps clean every heart and business that will accept its teachings. After the battle of Inkermann, a dead soldier was found with his bloody finger pressing upon a leaf in his Bible. As they lifted his body, the leaf tore out, and one of his comrades read aloud the words upon which his finger rested, "I am the resurrection and the life!" While he was dying, he looked through these words of God into the future, bright as hope in Christ could make it. And no other book could give such an experience to a dying soldier on the battlefield.

A colporteur handed a pocket Bible to another soldier of the Crimean War as the troops were leaving Toulon. He said, "I will light my pipe with it." The colporteur regretted that he had given it to him, but prayed that God would somehow use it for his good. Several years afterward the colporteur stopped for a night in a peasant's home in France. He saw lying on the table a well-worn, soiled Bible. On opening it, he noticed the front leaves were torn out. The mother said to him, "I prize that book very highly. My boy was in the Crimean War and was mortally wounded in one of the battles. It was this book that led him to Christ, and gave him a hope of heaven." The colporteur recognized the book as the same one that he had given to the soldier at Toulon. He had torn out some of the leaves to light his pipe with, yet, when the hour of suffering arrived, he turned to the book which he had despised, for light and comfort.

The book is life and light and joy to every one who believes it. It brings about a revolution through the immediate agency of God. It introduces a new light, which grows and develops after its kind. There is no such thing as evolving flesh into spirit, and the natural into the spiritual man. The first birth is not the germ out of which the second birth grows. We become partakers of the Divine nature; it is God in the soul making all things new. The attempt to make men Christians by a process of education has been tried with dismal failure. Bishop Colenso took a band of Zulu youth and gave them a good education in England. After they had advanced in their studies, he suggested that they now turn their attention to the consideration of the claims of Christianity; but, in the words of Dr. Gordon, "They kicked up their heels and went back to their former heathen practices." The good Bishop had to confess that his experiment was a failure. Hans Egede spent fifteen years in Greenland educating the people, attempting, as he said, to bring them to a point where they could be intelligent Christians. With a broken heart he preached his farewell sermon from the text, "I have labored in vain; I have spent my strength for naught." Two years later, John Beck succeeded Egede on this field. He began at once to preach Christ crucified, and the result was the conversion of Karjanack, who became a flame of evangelistic zeal amid the frozen regions of Greenland. Christ's death and resurrection in their revolutionary power effected in him at once what fifteen years of training could not accomplish in others.

Some of us have heard from the lips of John G. Paton how the whole Island of Aniwa had been turned to Christ, so that among all its inhabitants there is not a single heathen. Such is the Bible, because the living Christ goes with it and works as he will.

The Perils of the Dance

WHEN we speak of the dance nowadays, we usually mean the waltz. And what is waltzing? Is it not dancing gone mad? Is it not the whirlwind—the awful result of careless sowing through generations past? The wild, passionate, insistent, though polished and courtly, libertine of modern society?

Let it be thoroughly understood, I am not writing about the dance as it was in scriptural times; not about the dance as it was in log-cabin days; not about the dance as it might be; but about the dance as it is,—the intoxicating cup of sensualism, the destroyer of virtue, the blunting hammer of the finer and higher sensibilities, and eventually the curse of body, soul, spirit, home, and happiness! I am writing about the dance as a dangerous pathway leading oftentimes to sorrow here, and hell hereafter, and if I choose harsh words occasionally in handling my subject, it is because no other kind will equal the emergency. The ballroom is one way, and a very broad way, too, to ruin.

Bishop Hopkins, of Vermont, senior bishop at the time of his death, and one of the most gifted intellects of his church, wrote on the subject as follows:

"In the period of youthful education, I have shown that dancing is chargeable with waste of time, the interruption of useful study, the indulgence of personal vanity and display, and the premature incitement of the passions. At the age of maturity it adds to these no small danger to health, by late hours, flimsy dresses, heated rooms, and exposed persons; while its incongruity with strict Christian sobriety and principle, and its tendency to love of dissipation, are so manifest that no ingenuity can make it consistent with the covenant of baptism. It would give me sincere pleasure to have expressed a very different opinion, because I am well aware that few of my readers will relish my unaccommodating sentiments on such a theme. But candor and honesty forbid, and I may not sacrifice what I believe to be the truth, in the service of worldly expediency."

The uniform testimony of all religious specialists is, that as the love of dancing increases the love of the Lord and his work decreases. The spirit of the dance is not the spirit of the Master. If the one be harbored, the other will not remain. Where the experiment is tried of retaining both, a horrible muddle is the result, a corruption which disgraces the holy "vocation wherewith we are called." (Eph. 4: 1). The dance is a deadly poison to the higher life, and he, who professing Christianity, takes it into his spiritual system, wounds our Lord afresh, and by the act classes himself with the traitors of old who killed the world's only hope by nailing the Son of Mary to the cruel cross.

GOD SENT DELIVERANCE

How a Party of Evangelists was Unexpectedly Vindicated from a Criminal Charge

At the time of a great religious revival in 1744, two noted preachers of the time, Mr. Rowland and Mr. Tennent, were meeting with greater success than was pleasing to the tavern-keepers, who found it injurious to their business. Mr. Rowland, in particular, was possessed of a pleasing manner and great eloquence, and soon became quite celebrated, greatly to the disgust of his opponents, who regarded the revivalists as fanatics and poptites. There was at this time a man named Bell, a person well educated and possessed of a keen intellect, but devoid of principle. He was thought to be connected with a gang of robbers. This man, unfortunately, bore a very striking resemblance to Mr. Rowland in external appearance, so much so, indeed, that he might easily pass for the preacher. One day a friend of Mr. Rowland's met Bell at a tavern at Princeton. He addressed him as Rowland, and invited home his wife and as he supposed, and it was with some difficulty that Bell convinced him of his mistake. This hint was enough for him. He went the next day to a nearby place where he knew Mr. Rowland had preached once or twice, but was not immediately known. He introduced himself as Mr. Rowland, and was invited to preach the next Sabbath. To this he consented, and was invited to the home of one of the deacons and treated with the utmost respect. He was invited to go to church with the ladies, in the carriage, and the master of the house accompanied them, mounted on a fine horse. When they had nearly reached the church, he suddenly discovered that he had left his notes in his room, and proposed going back on the horse, as he could go faster this way, and he could get the notes. At this the gentleman readily agreed. This was the last seen of the preacher, and upon their return, they found that his house had been rifled. Wherever Bell stopped, he called himself the Rev. David Rowland. At the time of this robbery, Mr. Rowland and Mr. Tennent, accompanied by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Stevens (both members of the church where happened this robbery), were holding meetings at a town in Pennsylvania. Soon after their return, Mr. Rowland was charged with the theft, and gave bonds to appear at the next term of court. On the trial, Messrs. Tennent, Anderson and Stevens appeared as witnesses and easily proved an alibi, by saying that on the day the robbery was committed they were with Mr. Rowland, and heard him preach, as did many others. The jury acquitted him, but the affair was not yet ended. The person from whom the horse had been stolen was positive that Rowland was the thief. His opponents collected a mass of evidence of this kind, which they thought proved the fact; but Mr. Rowland could not be tried again, for vengeance was directed against the witnesses by whose testimony he had been cleared; and they were arraigned for perjury. After an examination, they were indicted, and Mr. Anderson, living in the county town, and conscious of his innocence, demanded a trial at the first term of court. He was found guilty, and sentenced to stand one hour on the court-house steps, wearing this inscription on his breast, "This is for wilful and corrupt perjury," which sentence was executed. Messrs. Tennent and Stevens were summoned to appear at the next court, and a Mr. Cox, a lawyer of eminence, was employed to conduct their case, but as they could not prove an alibi, their case looked doubtful. Mr. Cox requested to see their witnesses before the day of their trial. Mr. Tennent answered that they had none but God. Mr. Cox replied, "If you have no witnesses the trial must be postponed, otherwise you will certainly be convicted. Strong testimony will be brought against you and you have nothing to oppose it." Mr. Tennent said, "I know all this, but I know I am innocent, and God will not suffer me to fall. Therefore, gentlemen, go on with the trial." Mr. Cox told him that before a heavenly tribunal this might be all important to him, but would not avail in the present case; "but," he continued, "there is one chance, as I have discovered a flaw in the indictment which may prove favorable." Mr. Tennent asked an explanation, and was told it was to admit the fact, in a legal point of view, and rest on the law in the case. This Mr. Tennent refused to do. He assured his counsel God would bring about his deliverance in some way, and he did not wish the trial delayed. Mr. Stevens was not of the same mind, and took advantage of the opportunity, and was discharged on the exception. Mr. Tennent started for the court, and now comes the strange part of the affair. He had not gone far before he met a man and a woman, who stopped him, and asked if his name was Tennent. He replied that it was, and asked if they had business with him. The man replied, "You know best as to that." He gave his name, and said they (his wife and he) were from Pennsylvania; that Messrs. Tennent, Rowland, Anderson and Stevens had lodged at their house on the night of the robbery. They had heard Mr. Tennent preach the next day, and had seen all the gentlemen several times during the day. The man said, some nights before, he and his wife had each dreamed at the same time that he (Mr. Tennent) was in great distress, and they, and they alone, could relieve him. Considering it merely a singular coincidence, they went to sleep again, when the dream was repeated to both twice, in precisely the same way. This made such an impression on their minds that they decided to visit him, and here they were.

Mr. Tennent took them at once to his lawyer, who found their testimony all he could wish. Before the trial began, another witness appeared, and before the day was over, still another. In short, they traced every movement of the defendant during the Saturday, Sabbath and Monday in question. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty, without leaving their place. This was taken from the court record, and is essentially true. Mrs. E. J. P.

REST IN THE PROMISE

Joseph's Confident Belief in God's Overruling Power

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE book of Genesis, which is a book of beginnings and of births, ends with the description of two deaths—those of Jacob and of Joseph. Each of these deaths was characteristic of the life. Jacob was occupied with the place of his burial: his last charge to Joseph was concerning it. To the very last he could not fully trust God's promises; he must make sure of man, because he was not fully sure of God. True faith rests: "we which have believed do enter unto rest" (Heb. 4: 3). Joseph, when he came to die, could be quite satisfied to be buried in Egypt, leaving only a charge that when the children of Israel should go out of Egypt, his bones should be taken up out of Egypt into Canaan. Both patriarchs believed God's Word; but Jacob mixed up a great deal of human anxiety and human effort with his faith. Joseph simply counted on his God, and added neither his own efforts nor yet dependence on any human creature, to his simple but real faith in God.

It must have been God's intimation to Jacob that the time for him to die approached; it was "after these things that one said to Joseph, 'Behold, thy father is sick.'" When Joseph heard of his father's sickness, he took his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, to seek the transmission of the hereditary blessing of Abraham upon them. And Jacob did bless them, but he could not transmit that inheritance of faith which shone in Joseph as a true son of Abraham. Yet there was no small meaning in the way in which the now blind old man crossed his hands, laying the right hand on Ephraim, the younger, and his left hand on Manasseh, the elder one. God always chooses that which is lightly esteemed among men. Joseph in this matter did not understand, and sought to transpire his father's hands; but Jacob had his commands from God, and knew what he was doing. Both sons were to be blessed, both were to have their grandfather's name, with Abraham's and Isaac's called upon them; but the younger was to be the greater.

The last of Jacob's strength was spent in an inspired prophecy about his sons. It was worthy of this patriarch that his life's evening should not be absorbed by the ministry during his last hours to a worn-out and dying body, but rather the communication of God's messages to his family. In Jacob's charge each son's character and his future were traced by the unerring hand of him who knoweth what is in man. Jacob, after blessing them, "everyone according to his blessing, charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people," and repeated to them his desire about his burial, regarding which he had made Joseph swear. "And when Jacob had made an end of charging his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people." Joseph faithfully carried out the desire of his father, and Pharaoh entered into the arrangements for the princely and expensive funeral of Jacob in Canaan, which followed after seventy days of mourning in Egypt. Joseph's education was not yet complete; he had been fitted by God through severe lessons in his early life to be ruler over Egypt, and by way of rehearsal, to become a blessing to "all the nations of the earth," as God had promised Abraham (Gen. 22: 18), and as the Jews shall yet be (Zech. 8: 13).

Joseph was now to be tried in a way which would put him to the test, even more than all else which he had already gone through. He had given abundant evidence to his brethren of his full pardon for all their past injustice and evil dealing with him; he had never manifested the least retaliation against them; all his behavior was such as to call forth and demand their deep gratitude, and their fullest confidence. But it was just in this that he was to be tried.

Joseph had had it in his power to wreak vengeance to the full upon his brethren, but instead of this he had treated them with the most magnanimous kindness, and begged them to forget their sin against him, saying, "It was not you, but God, that brought me hither to preserve you a posterity in the earth" (Gen. 45: 7). What, then, must have been his bitter disappointment when, after his father's death, he perceived that a change had come over his brethren, which reached a climax when a message reached him from them: "Thy father did command before he died, saying, So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee, now, the transgression of thy brethren and their sin, for that they did unto thee evil; and now, we pray thee, forgive the transgression of the servants of the God of thy father." What could it mean? Had they suspected him of playing a part all these seventeen years? Had he given them any ground for such suspicion? Could it be that they had carried their suspicions to Jacob, and embittered their father's last days by insinuations against Joseph? This was worse than when "his feet were hurt with fetters," again, and more deeply, "the iron entered into his soul" (Ps. 105: 18).

The wording of their message, the naming themselves as "the servants of the God of thy father," while they cherished such unworthy and uncalled for thoughts against him who had acted so in the spirit of God towards them, enhanced the bitterness of their suspicions. The archers again "sorely grieved him and shot at him, and persecuted him" (Gen. 49: 23). "But his bow abode in strength," and again "the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the Mighty God of Jacob." He did not defend himself, he did not reproach them, but he who had all power in the land, he who could have done so much against them, and who had been such a benefactor, and whom they so unjustly suspected and misunderstood, met them only with tears. "Joseph wept when they spake to him." He had no other weapon. "The Shepherd, the Stone of Israel" (Gen. 49: 24), who was his lineal descendant in the line of "the father of all of them that believe," wept over Jerusalem when the lineal descendants of the unbelieving seed of Abraham knew not their Messiah when he appeared, nor "the time of their visitation" (Luke 19: 41-44).

A MOUNTAIN MISSIONARY

THE life of a missionary of the American Sunday School Union is often full of the trying and interesting adventure which falls to those who travel through forests and over mountains. Usually, his tours are made alone. Sometimes, for "a short trip," he takes his family along, and they are helpful in starting Sunday Schools and in visitation work. The following account of one of Missionary Little's "short tours" may interest many readers who enjoy a "tale of woods and streams." It is supplied through the courtesy of the Secretary of the A. S. S. U., Rev. E. P. Bancroft, 158 Fifth avenue:

Early one morning my wife, her mother, and our four youngest children, left Greenville in a stout, covered wagon, our destination being Anderson Branch, N. C., where I had an appointment for the Sabbath following. We stopped at noon by a beautiful mountain stream, fed our horses, and cooked dinner over a camp fire. After dinner, we began climbing the mountains. A thunder storm caught us on top. The family took refuge in an old barn, and I staid with the frightened horses. The wind blew a gale and drove the rain into the wagon, soaking everything. Bad roads were worse after this, and the wind had blown trees across our way. With my axe, I had to chop trees and fallen boughs out of the road. It was beginning to grow dark in the mountains when we reached the first dwelling, whose owner said he could not keep us. He said that about a mile further, in a deep ravine, we would find a lumber camp, and perhaps there we would be allowed to occupy one of the "shacks," in which the men cooked and slept. It was quite dark when we reached a point where, by the noise of the talking and singing of the lumbermen, we could locate their camp. Our arrival was a surprise to the men, who, however, kindly vacated one of the rude board shacks, in which there was a small fireplace. We presented a sorry plight. Slipping and sliding down the mountains, we had been beaten by the foliage of the bushes and trees, and had suffered from frequent falls in the mud.

The first work was to build a fire by which the women and children could warm and dry themselves and cook a supper. The next was to bring the horses and such things as we needed down the mountainside—we had left our wagon on top, the way being too slippery, dark and unknown, to risk descent in it. When this was over, our hot coffee and bread and butter was a welcome feast. Disposing ourselves on the floor and on two rude beds made of small trees, we wrapped up in the damp bed-clothes and went to sleep. Next morning the sun shining and a beautiful day before us.

After a breakfast of fried pork, coffee and bread, we carried our things back up the mountain to the wagon, hitched the horses and set forth. About three miles from where we camped we came to the top of Rich Mountain, where we stopped until afternoon, spreading damp clothing on logs and bushes in the sun to dry. We were absent eight days on this trip. The roads were almost impassable in many places. We were, however, fully repaid for all discomforts, for we were enabled to do much missionary work. Perhaps that night among the kind lumbermen, we sowed some seed that may bear good fruit.

THE FATHER'S LOVE GIFTS

TAKE every little blessing
And brightness of each day,
As from the loving Father,
To cheer thy earthly way.

Given to thee, his chosen,
His thought of love for thee,
Thine own peculiar treasure,
From his infinity.

Then will the Unseen Presence,
More real seem and near,
Sweeter the still communings,
His love to thee more dear.

GOD'S LEADERSHIP
Discipline Sometimes Painful Always Tending to the Development of Character

MEN frequently boast that they are self-made, meaning that by their own unaided efforts they have attained the position they occupy. Others, who are in poverty or obscurity, complain that luck has gone against them, implying that life is a game of chance, in which merit does not always gain its reward, and the industrious and honest worker does not always succeed. In the Orient, they place the responsibility on fate, and believe that good or evil fortune is meted out by an inflexible will, and that no effort can change the course of events, which are all mapped out before life begins. More intelligent, as well as more encouraging, is the view of the Psalmist which, in part, is the Christian view, that God leads his children and adapts the circumstances of their lives to their development and their higher interests. A cursory view of life does not always justify the Psalmist's thankful avowal. The Christian's life is always in green pastures and beside still waters. Sometimes it is passed in the hurly-burly of a troubled scene, in the midst of conflict and with uncongenial associates. He has to suffer, and that, too, he faults not his own. Misfortunes of flood and fire and robbery come upon him. It seems in many cases, as if he had more of them than wicked men, and when he dies without such vindication as reparation as came to Job.

It is to be noted that under the Christian dispensation, there is no promise of prosperity being the result of righteousness. Indeed, Christ warned his followers that in the world they would have tribulation. In our time and country there is, perhaps, a better prospect before a godly young man than before one who takes no interest in religion. People are more disposed to respect him and trust him, but even among ourselves, the man who is really a consistent Christian is often at a disadvantage in business, as he must refrain from methods which bring gain to less scrupulous men. To follow where Christ leads, is neither in vogue nor any other, a sure or even a probable way to worldly success. It does not insure immunity from trouble, nor from the ordinary ills of life. It is well that this should be understood at the beginning of the Christian life. Those who follow where Christ leads seek other objects. Wealth and honor may come to them, but it is not for those that they take that path. But whatsoever their worldly lot, there is for those whom God blesses, a peace and joy that no worldly circumstances can give. In the consciousness that all the events of life are designed to develop the spiritual life there is a deep satisfaction. It is beyond regret; it is acquiescence in God's will. To be thwarted in a design causes distress, because the thwarting is an event that success would have been glorious. Sickness, poverty, bereavement are accepted as parts of God's plan for spiritual growth or for increased capacity for service. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be;" but that this life's preparation is the only solution of the great problem.

His mode of looking at life is far removed from fatalism. It does not repress effort. It is simply making the supreme object of life the highest spiritual development and the most efficient service. Worldly business may be pursued with earnestness, care and fidelity, but success in it is subordinated to the higher object. That is God's will for man, and in following the same will and desire man prepares himself in the divine way, and is sure of obtaining success in it. God's leading is ever upward to the higher planes, and the way he removes by his discipline the dross from the soul and increases its strength. The discipline is often painful, but it is necessary, otherwise it would not be applied, and its results tend directly to perfection of character.

That, then, becomes of prayer, if God's will is to be accepted cheerfully and without question? If we leave everything in his hands, to do with us whatsoever he will, why should we ask him for anything?

... of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union to Nov. 3. Psalm 23.

There remains much to ask him for. We need strength to do and bear his will. We need perception to see the lessons our trials are designed to teach. We need that subordination of the flesh to the spirit that only he can give. Even in worldly matters we may follow our Lord's example when he prayed that the cup might pass from him, adding, as he did, if it might not pass from him unless he drank it, God's will may be done. The dutiful child may express his wish, though he will not tease to have an earthly father gratify it. We know that God does not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men. If, therefore, the lesson of some impending trial be already learned, the trial may be averted. The one indispensable condition of the leadership of God is confidence and trust in him.

A WORK OF FAITH
A Mission and Training Institute to be Established at Pittsburg, Pa., in Dependence on Divine Support

FAITH in God, such as Mr. George Muller made the principle of his life, has been exercised by a worker in our own land, in beginning a new enterprise. It is a work of a different kind from that of the famous orphanages, but it is a very necessary and very beneficent work. It is the establishment of a Bible School, similar in its object to that which Mr. Moody organized in Chicago. The need for such an institution in the Middle States has long been felt, but the way to establish it did not seem to be open. Now, however, a beginning is to be made, and it is to be distinctly a work of faith.

On the last Sunday in September, the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church, of Canonsburg, Pa., heard with deep regret that their pastor, Rev. Charles H. Pridgeon, had decided to sever his connection with them, which has continued with marked success for twelve years past. Mr. Pridgeon is a young man, and it was hoped that a long career of usefulness in this, which was his first charge, was before him. His explanation, however, showed that in resigning his pulpit, he was thinking not of his own interests, but of the larger needs of Christ's kingdom.

Mr. Pridgeon intends to establish an Institute which shall be at once a mission and a training school for Christian workers. It is not to be a college, for theology will not be taught there, but there will be systematic Bible study, combined with music and the methods of evangelistic work. It is to be located at Pittsburg, Pa., where a consecrated, wealthy Christian has placed a suitable building at Mr. Pridgeon's disposal. It is to be entirely undenominational, though it is hoped that it will become a useful help to all evangelical denominations. An interesting feature of the work, is that the students will not be required to pay fees for tuition. There will be a small initiatory fee, but even that will be remitted in cases where, as so often happens, there is ability and consecration in a candidate who is without means. Mr. Pridgeon believes that in a work commenced with no object but that of extending Christ's kingdom there will be no lack of funds. He is confident that God will supply all that is needed. His wife, who is well known in New York, and has marked ability as a worker and a musical teacher, is heartily with him in the enterprise and will aid him in all branches of the work.

President Roosevelt's Sermon
Dr. J. W. Crenshaw, of Cadiz, Ky., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the 2d of October is just received, containing President Roosevelt's remarkable sermon, delivered in the Presbyterian Church at Oyster Bay, N. Y., June 11, 1900. I write to suggest that this sermon, together with the one delivered at Chicago a short time since, on 'Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only,' be published in two forms, one a cheap edition, with which we can sow the land 'knee-deep,' and one in handsome binding, for the 'centre table.' I want to see that every boy in my community has a copy, simply for the asking, and even without the asking. We should be proud of a President who can preach such sermons, and show our appreciation by sending them broadcast over the land."

CASH FOR YOUR REAL ESTATE

Or Business, No Matter Where It Is

TELL me what kind of a property you have, where it is located, and what it is worth; tell me how it compares with other similar properties in your locality; give the population of your city, or town, or county; state the distance to nearest post office and the nearest railroad station; give reason for selling and other information that would interest a possible buyer. I will then tell you how a cash buyer can be quickly found by my method. I will make no charge for writing you fully and outlining the manner in which my plan can be made to fit your individual requirements. If you want to buy any kind of a property anywhere, tell me just what you desire, and I can, in all probability, be of very great and profitable service to you. Do any of the following properties interest you?

A HANDSOME RESIDENCE IN KNOXVILLE, TENN.

THIS attractive property is about two miles from the centre of the city of Knoxville, Tenn., whose climate is considered one of the most delightful in the United States, approaching very nearly that of Asheville, N. C., the famous health resort. The house is in the most fashionable suburb of Knoxville. It stands on an elevation overlooking the river and the view includes several miles of the river in two directions, with the Chilhowee and Smoky Mountains as a background. The grounds comprise 8 acres, at the back of which flows a mountain stream. There are beautifully laid out walks, flowers, driveways, etc. The house is of brick, built only four years ago. It contains 12 rooms, and has all the conveniences and luxuries that its outside appearance would naturally suggest. It is lighted by both gas and electricity. No expense was spared in its interior arrangement and finish. It is known throughout the State of Tennessee for its elegance and beauty. The entire property is for sale for just what the house cost to build four years ago, when every thing was low—$30,000—and only $5,000 is required in cash.

A California Orange and Lemon Orchard

THIS is a splendid little orchard of 9 acres, all in oranges and lemons, ten years old and in full bearing. It is in San Diego County within 2 1/2 miles of the ocean and 3 miles from the Mexican line. It is piped and flumed for irrigation, and independent of the water system, as there is a good well on the premises. The cottage shown in illustration below is one story, hardwood finished throughout, with two verandas. There is a double walled lemon house (for packing), chicken houses and barn. The climate is ideal. The present owner came here a year ago in very poor health. Has regained it now, and wishes to return to his business in the east. The property is a bargain at $5,000. Write for terms and particulars.

AN IDEAL FLORIDA HOTEL SITE

I have for sale, in Daytona, Florida, some building lots with a total frontage of 235 feet on the Halifax River. The lots run back 500 feet to Palmetto Ave. From one of the lots the natural forest has never been cut—on the other stands a good store building and a dwelling. There is also another small lot fronting the ocean, which could be used for pavilion, bath houses, etc. The location of the store is indicated by the cross in the above picture. Daytona is a very live town, and is rapidly growing into favor as a winter resort. A hotel erected on this property would be a paying investment. The property, buildings, riparian rights and beach lot will be sold for $35,000—half cash. This is exceptionally low, and offers golden opportunity for some enterprising man with capital. Write for full details.

A BARGAIN AT TOMS RIVER, N.J.

THIS is a fine little farm of 8 1/2 acres on the main road from Toms River to Island Heights, and only eight miles from Lakewood, New Jersey's most exclusive summer resort.

There is a fine orchard on the farm. The house is modern, has six rooms and plenty of porch room, and is fully furnished. The railroad station and post office at Toms River are only 1 1/2 miles away. Besides affording a comfortable home, this farm can be made profitable by the sale of fruit, fowls and farm produce—these finding a ready sale in the neighboring summer resorts.

The price of the property is $7,500. Write for terms and full description. I have a number of New Jersey farms in desirable locations. Tell me approximately the size, location and price you wish to pay, and I will send descriptions of places that will probably suit you.

An Attractive Country Seat in Carroll Co., N. H.

THIS is a fine estate of 123 acres—60 of which are in native timber. It is in one of the most picturesque sections of New Hampshire. The commodious house was built by day labor in 1898, is hardwood finished and has open fireplaces. There is a fine apple orchard, and a grove of maples yielding 250 lbs. sugar yearly, a good barn and servant's house. There is plenty of bass, trout and pickerel fishing, and partridge-deer shooting. The house is at an elevation of 1,050 ft. above sea level. The place is an ideal country estate for a gentleman of leisure who is fond of good sport and beautiful scenery. The illustration at the upper right hand corner of this page, is one of the picturesque views which this property affords. Price $4,750—$2,500 cash. The house alone cost $4,200 to build. Write for details, photographs and plans.

A NICE COUNTRY SEAT IN MASSACHUSETTS

THIS desirable property is only half a mile from Norfolk, Mass., and only 23 miles from Boston, on the N. Y., N. H., and H. R. R. The farm covers altogether 14 acres, 8 of which are under plow, and 3 1/2 are in native timber. There is a good orchard, a fine lawn set out with young shade trees, strawberry bed, one acre of blackberries, and some currants. The house is exceptionally well built. Its size is 34 x 26 feet; 8 rooms, bath room, and a large attic in which two more rooms could be made; furnace heat; running water on two floors. There are two good wells on the place, and a windmill supplying water to house and barn. The barn is 40 x 18, with cellar. There are two large hen-houses on the property. This property is admirably suited to the requirements of a gentleman who desires a pleasant home and small farm. The price is very low—$4,000—$2,600 down, balance on mortgage. I have some other Massachusetts properties that may interest you.

MEMORIAL GATEWAY TO THE CAMPUS

HOW to celebrate appropriately the two-hundredth birthday of Yale University must have been a problem of some difficulty even to the eminent men to whom it was confided. The imposing ceremonies of last week are a sufficient proof of their large-minded comprehension as well as of their tact and artistic taste. What Yale is to the nation at large and what it has done for the nation during its past history were shown by object lessons that none could fail to understand, and by living examples of whom the whole nation is proud. About 11,000 men are still living who have graduated from Yale. They are scattered over the whole world, and no small proportion of them left their work in distant lands to take part in this great celebration. If one can imagine the long muster-roll of the eminent graduates, now dead and gone, looking on, what an assemblage of historic characters living and dead, that New England town would have held! The dead were not forgotten, but the living formed a group that sufficiently attested that Yale is not obliged to go back to the grave to prove her efficiency as a teacher, and her claims on the gratitude of the nation. Her living sons occupy places so prominent in statesmanship, in science, on the bench, at the bar, in the pulpit and in all the walks of life in which learning and talent are needed for success, and are doing service so valuable that the University is entitled to be proud of them. Distinguished men from the universities of our own and other lands came to congratulate Yale on her bi-centenary making, with her own alumni, an assemblage as illustrious as any that the world has seen in recent years.

The celebration began appropriately with a service in Battell Chapel, on Oct. 20. Rev. Joseph H. Twichell, always popular with Yale men, was the preacher. In the afternoon the pulpit was occupied by Dr. George P. Fisher, whose writings have made the Yale University of our generation famous the world over. To him the service must have been pathetic, as it was the close of his long and brilliant career in connection with the university. On Monday two orations celebrated the contributions of Yale to the professions of law and medicine. Mr. Thomas Thacher, of New York, who graduated from Yale thirty years ago, spoke for the former, and Dr. William H. Welch, of Johns Hopkins, of the 1870 class, for the latter. On Tuesday the subjects were the work of Yale as it has contributed through her sons to the development of the great West in intellectual and educational life, and the share Yale has had in the advance of science and letters during its past history. President Cyrus Northrop, of the University of Minnesota, was the orator on the former topic, and was able to bear the testimony of an eye-witness, and ex-President Daniel C. Gilman, now of Johns Hopkins University, who graduated from Yale nearly half a century ago, dealt with the latter. On Wednesday was recited the Commemorative Ode, written by Mr. Edmund Clarence Stedman, a graduate of Yale in 1853, and an address was given by Mr. Justice Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court of the class of 1856. The day was further conspicuous by the visit of President Roosevelt, on whom the University conferred the degree of LL.D., as it conferred the same degree, one hundred and twenty years ago, on George Washington.

The most picturesque feature of the celebration was the torchlight procession on Monday night, in which two thousand students took part. This was so arranged as to represent the successive eras in Yale's history. The academic seniors, costumed as Indians, indicated the earliest period; next came the scientific seniors, attired in cloaks and tall hats, representing the colonial period; then a band in long coats and beaver hats such as the students wore in 1812; and so on down to the present time, when the academic garb was enlivened by a group of rough-riders and a detachment in the uniform of the naval brigade from the Cruiser Yale. Following were great bodies of graduates in the order of graduation, all wearing blue caps and gowns and bearing torches. Not only was the campus, but the whole town of New Haven illuminated for the occasion, the municipality having grown out of the old jealousy of "gown and town" so thoroughly as to be proud of its famous seat of learning. It voted $1,500 for decorations, and the business men of the town gave upwards of $2,000 for general use in the festival.

The musical features of the celebration were not likely to be neglected in the hands of Dr. Parker, Professor of the Theory of Music in the University. The Greek Festival Hymn, written by Professor Goodell and set to music by Professor Parker, was beautifully rendered by a specially trained choir, at the Wednesday celebration. Professor Parker's great work, Hora Novissima, was presented under his leadership. There was also an organ recital in Battell Chapel, by Professor Jepson, and Dr. Sanford, Professor of Applied Music, led a student's chorus in popular music and the singing of old and new songs and hymns. On Tuesday afternoon there was a grand concert on a most elaborate scale in the Hyperion Theatre, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke.

Exhibitions of rare interest also formed part of the bi-centennial celebration. One was that of antiquated manuscripts and volumes bearing on American education and the history of the University. It included the old text-books of 1701, and on, in complete series to 1850. A loan collection was also made of old diplomas, the earliest of which was conferred on Nathaniel Chauncey in 1702. A fine collection of old pianos and clavichords was in the exhibition of the Musical Department, and a number of pictures by John Trumbull, the Revolutionary painter, whose large canvases in the Capitol at Washington are familiar to all visitors.

EX-PRESIDENT DWIGHT

PRESIDENT ARTHUR T. HADLEY

PROF. GEO. P. FISHER

In addition to all these, there was a series of volumes prepared specially for the occasion by members of the faculty, each dealing with the progress made during the two centuries in his respective field of study.

This was the fourth grand celebration in the history of Yale. The first was in 1718, when the institution, after being removed from Saybrook, on Long Island Sound, where it was founded in 1701, to New Haven, had what was then described as "a splendid collegiate house." This was a plain structure of wood painted blue, a picture of which appears on the next page. The interior was divided into a chapel, also used as a dining-hall; a library, a kitchen and twenty sets of rooms for the students. The celebration was held in the chapel, and among the distinguished guests were Governor Saltonstall and Hon. William Taylor, who represented Elihu Yale, "of London." As Mr. Yale had given $2,812 toward the founding of the college, the trustees "solemnly named the building Yale College," to perpetuate the memory of the benefactor, "who had granted so liberal and bountiful a donation for the perfecting and adorning of it." In 1751 a second

A RUSSIAN MUJIK

SCHOOLBOYS RECEIVING A LESSON IN AGRICULTURE

"THE LITTLE FATHER"

BESIDES being "Autocrat of all the Russias" and head of the Greek Orthodox Faith, the Czar has always evinced a desire to be the leader of his people in matters of industry. As president of the Trans-Siberian Railroad he often presides at the meetings of its directors, and it is his pride that with his own hands he drove the first spike in its construction, eight years ago, at Vladivostok.

Under his rule Siberia has become the garden spot and hope of the Russian Empire. American seed grain has been introduced, and Yankee methods of agriculture are taught by specialists who travel from district to district. Model farming villages have been built by royal command all through Siberia and money advanced to the new settlers, to whom every opportunity has been offered to become independent farmers.

With 90 per cent. of his 140,000,000 subjects dependent on the soil, the Little Father at St. Petersburg naturally gives much of his time to the consideration of different plans for the amelioration of their condition. The Russian mujik, or peasant, is not progressive; moreover, he is hardheaded, prefers his primitive plough which, without much exertion on his part, may be made to scratch the soil; looks with horror on innovations unknown to his fathers, and absolutely refuses to alter his methods, unless at express command of the Czar. No Russian would disobey the White Father, any more than he would commit sacrilege, or show disrespect to the Ikon, or holy picture which hangs in the room of every Russian, high or low. Evidently the Czar relies on the force of example for carrying out his reforms. Everywhere on his appanages, or private lands—which embrace thousands of square miles in various parts of the empire—every known agricultural improvement has been introduced; further still, on these great plantations are maintained numerous experimental agricultural stations. In Central Asia it is tobacco and cotton seed from America that are experimented with, and the peasants are sent to learn the best methods of cultivating the new products. In the Trans-Caucasus, tea-growing has been successfully introduced, and the peasants are being initiated by Chinamen into the art of preparing the leaves for the market. In the Caucasus and the Crimea, the vineyards are being brought to perfection.

The Russian Government, recognizing the fact that alcohol is the great curse of the country, is seeking in every way to mitigate the horrors it creates. Vodka (pure rye brandy), is the drink of the peasant. During the long winter nights, and even during the days, the mujik remains in his cottage, asleep on the stove. A few million men, women and children, it is true, find work at home: lace-making, carving all kinds of wooden ware, wheelmaking, moulding clay and painting Ikons; but for the vast majority, who neither read nor write, there is nothing to look forward to during the long winter months. These seek oblivion in drink. In vain the Government has taken the vodka traffic in hand and made it a monopoly. The peasants being forbidden to drink over the bar, vodka is sold to them in bottles which they merely step outside long enough to empty, and come back for more; often pawning their clothing in lieu of cash. Royalty has organized a temperance movement on a grand scale in the large cities, where free, open-air concerts are given, at which tea and soft drinks are served. Temperance restaurants have been established, and in summer, great barges take the people out on river excursions. The temperance movement is growing, yet there are whole districts in Siberia that are deserted, simply because the bread made from the wheat grown in the damp climate, ferments to such an extent that it causes a light form of intoxication.

The Czar spares neither effort nor expense in placing object lessons before his simple folk. Immense barges, a thousand feet in length, on the open decks of which experimental farms are operated, float down the great streams of Russia, stopping at every village. The peasants are invited aboard, and there given practical lessons in modern farming, and in this way new methods and plants are introduced. Children of the peasant attend schools where, in addition to reading, writing and arithmetic, they learn valuable lessons in practical agriculture. On Arbor Day they plant various kinds of trees, over which they are expected to watch, and in summer they assist in harvesting and in haymaking.

celebration was held, which consisted mainly in a long oration in Latin by Tutor (afterwards President) Ezra Stiles, covering almost "the entire range of human knowledge," with special reference "to the promulgation of education among the Chaldeans, Chinese and Phœnicians." The third celebration was in 1850, in President Woolsey's administration. Only one day was allotted to it. The graduates, then a thousand strong, marched in procession to Centre Church, where President Woolsey delivered an oration. Afterwards there was an alumni dinner on the lawn, and a graduate celebration in the evening.

No more impressive object lesson of the growth of our country could have been given than the celebration of this bicentenary. The University has kept pace in its development with the development of the nation. The poor little college, over which Thomas Clap reigned with such vigor in 1740, grew in spite of its poverty and its difficulties. In his day there were only two professorial chairs, one of Divinity and the other of Natural Philosophy and Mathematics. Sixty years later, under President Dwight, there was only one department in the College; there were only four buildings, and the seniors, juniors, sophomores and freshmen together, made a total of not more than 212 students. That was the situation in 1801 under Dr. Dwight. When his grandson handed the reins to President Hadley, a century later, there were thirty-seven University buildings, 108 Professors, 162 tutors and 2,582 students. Such a growth in the comparatively short space of one century is truly phenomenal. To the men of 1801, looking back over the first century of the institution's existence the attainment seemed wonderful, as it was, in view of the obstacles which had been overcome. What the attainment will be during the third century on which Yale has entered, who can tell? But the future is bright with hope and she goes forward with the nation's good wishes.

BRIGANDS AND THEIR VICTIMS

Outlaws who Have Terrorized Society and, as in the Case of Miss Stone, Exact Heavy Ransom for their Prisoners

PROFESSOR William Roscoe

Thayer speaks of brigands as the "unerring products of bad government," and the case of the missionary, Miss Ellen M. Stone, seized by brigands for ransom in Turkey, has been a vivid reminder of the civilized world that Professor Thayer's definition is true. There has been no more striking triumph of Christian civilization in the nineteenth century than the actual extinction of brigandage, which, until far into that century, prevailed in a large part of Europe, and in at least one of the principal republics of America. Indeed, in the ruder period of the Far West and Southwest, brigandage—that organized outlawry for the purpose of plunder and extortion—was not unknown in the United States, and the Civil War also left bands of desperados in its wake whose operations might fairly come under the same head. At present, brigandage is extinct in every civilized government of Europe and America, it is altogether unknown in Protestant countries. Where it still lingers in western and northern Europe, its survival is due to justice exercised in the name of government, or to absolute anarchy, such as prevails in parts of the Turkish Empire. During the turmoil of the Middle Ages, when the weak had no rights which the strong were bound to respect, it was difficult to tell where brigandage ended, and where order—such as they were—began. The struggle between England and France for the crown of the latter country costed thousands of the unhappy French of brigands, and some of the fairest provinces of France were raided and ravaged for years by robber chiefs, who called themselves English or French, as might seem to their advantage, and lived by plunder.

The despotism, cruelty and superstition which have characterized so-called government in Italy, Spain, Greece and Turkey, have been mainly responsible for the existence of brigandage of those countries down to the present day. In Italy, the Bourbons encouraged brigandage, and armed the chiefs of banditti as instruments to carry out their despotic policy. Brigandage had been regularly employed by Ferdinand, the restored Bourbon sovereign, and Charass Murat, when the latter was king of Naples. Ferdinand, Professor Thayer tells us, "had kept a Guarglia, Fra Diavolo, and others only less infamous than these chiefs, in his pay. He had even appointed Fra Diavolo a brigadier-general and Duke of Cassano. Romance has succeeded in throwing a glamor of respectability round these lawbreakers, but their exploits, when shorn to the bare truth, appear simply as crimes, vulgar or heinous or bloodthirsty."

The prevalence of brigandage indicated the corruption of the Government and the lawlessness of the people. Everything conspired to make brigandage popular and profitable. There were many discharged soldiers who had now no occupation, and who preferred banditti to toil. There were also many criminals who, escaping arrest, took to the mountains, and preyed on the peasantry. Some of the communities sympathized with the brigands, but more frequently they were terrorized into paying tribute. The situation grew so serious that in the Bourbon Government felt the pressure. In each province a Junta was appointed, composed of the intendant, the commander of the troops, and the judge of the criminal court. They drew up a list of outlaws, set a price on every outlaw's head, and when one was captured, they had only to identify him with a name on the list. Identification having been established, he was executed without trial.

This Draconic method might have served the ends of justice had the lists been honestly compiled, but the Juntas ultimately became more hateful to peaceable citizens than the brigands themselves, and the Government was at length actually compelled to enter into a treaty with leading brigands, one of whom, Gaetano Vardarelli, was taken, with his forty followers, into the king's pay. Having thus got them into his power by deceit, Ferdinand had them entrapped and butchered.

It may be needless to say that such methods of putting down crime did not have satisfactory results. Brigandage continued to flourish, and survives to this day. It acted much like brigands in dealing with cargoes of flour sent from America for the relief of the starving poor of Greece. This was probably the first example of the charitable work of benevolent Americans, which was so splendidly carried on in later times by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A committee sent from New York in 1827, three cargoes, on the ship Chancellor, the brig Six Brothers, and the brig Jane. Dr. Howe, a missionary, had charge of the distribution. The cargoes were landed and put in a storehouse, and the poor Greeks flocked in throngs for the food. Suddenly Colocotroni, a Greek commander, caused the storehouse to be closed, and tried to seize all the flour. The American man-of-war Constitution was not far away, and Dr. Howe appealed to her commander, who made Colocotroni desist, and the greater part of the flour ultimately reached the poor as originally intended.

PEASANTS OF THE TURKO-BULGARIAN BORDER, WHERE MISS STONE WAS ABDUCTED

day in Italy and Sicily. The existence of brigandage in Sicily and southern Italy, is, no doubt, largely due to the wretched condition of the Italian and Sicilian peasantry. A notable instance is that of the famous brigand Mussolino, who terrorized a large section of Italy for years and defied all efforts at capture, but was run to earth at last.

It is probable that European Turkey and the mountainous parts of Greece have never, in modern times, been free from brigandage. Indeed, the very leaders who fought for Grecian independence

In 1870 brigands perpetrated a crime, not far from Athens, which aroused the horror and indignation of civilized mankind. Several English travelers, men and women, went to visit the battlefield of Marathon. The party included Lord and Lady Muncaster, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Vyner, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd and child. They were seized by Greek brigands, who demanded a ransom of 25,000 pounds sterling ($125,000). The brigands allowed the women and several others to go back to Athens, but kept three of the captives, Herbert, Vyner and Lloyd, as hostages for the payment of the money. Troops were sent from Athens to attempt a rescue of the prisoners and found the three Englishmen dead, their throats having been cut as soon as the brigands learned that the troops were coming to attack them. The Rev. Hugh Callan, M.A., a Scotch clergyman, who traveled in Albania in 1898, says that "internecine feuds—murder, robbery and pillage—go on daily."

Did space permit, many instances might be mentioned where captives were held for ransom. In 1871, an Englishman, his wife and her lady attendant, were taken by brigands in Valencia, and compelled to persuade friends to purchase their freedom. In 1870, two English tourists were taken near Gibraltar and paid $27,000 ransom. In 1874, Arthur Hazeldin was seized by banditti in the mountains of Andalusia, and his liberation cost his friends $35,000, which they gladly paid to save his life. In 1894, the entire body of local magistrates at Lamia, in Thessaly, were seized by a notorious bandit and his followers, but the situation quickly changed and the bandit crew was exterminated. In 1880, Col. I. H. Synge, an Englishman, was seized in the Carferia district of Macedonia, by a noted brigand named Nicko, and released after a heavy ransom had been paid by the British Government. Capt. Marriott and Mr. James Whitall, both Englishmen, were captured near Smyrna, in 1896, and $50,000 was demanded for their release. In 1898, three French ladies were seized at Ismidt, near the Turkish capital and only released upon payment of $50,000 by the French Government—the amount being afterwards repaid by Turkey. As a rule, the European Governments pay the ransoms demanded for their subjects, and are repaid later by the Government on whose territory the act of brigandage takes place. Between 1860 and 1880, the British authorities paid out $125,000 in connection with fourteen seizures by brigands. M. Louis Chevallier, a French engineer, was seized in 1898 in Macedonia, in the same territory where Miss Stone was captured, and he was detained for $125,000 ransom. In the same region, Mme. Branzéau, a French subject, was abducted, and only released upon payment of ransom. At a more recent date, the Rev. Arthur J. Smith, of the Howard Avenue M. E. Church, New Haven, Conn., was seized by bandits while visiting the tomb of Polycarp, near Smyrna, and he, with his companions, only escaped by flight after a severe handling, by a courageous dash for liberty. A notable case in our own land was the kidnapping of young Cudahy by a Western desperado, who exacted a heavy ransom from the father for the son's return.

The case of Miss Stone may justly be regarded as one of the most outrageous crimes in the history of banditism, and the more likely, for that reason, to arouse the Christian world to the necessity of effacing such vestiges of this barbarous and savage practice as continue to mar the map of Europe and of the world.

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

...SERMON BY...
Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

Far-Reaching Influences

TEXT--Job 38: 31:
Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?

WHAT is the meaning of that question which God put to Job? Have we all our lives been reading it, and are most of us ignorant of its beauty and power and practical suggestiveness? A meaningless passage of Scripture many thought it to be. But the telescopes were busy age after age, and astronomical observations kept on questioning the skies until the meaning of my text comes out lustroously. The Pleiades is a constellation of seven stars appearing to the naked eye, but scientific instruments reveal more than four hundred properly belonging to the group. Alcyone is the name of the brightest star of that group called the Pleiades. A Russian astronomer observed that Alcyone is the centre of gravitation of our solar system. Hugh Macmillan says that the sun and its planets wheel around that centre at the rate of four hundred and twenty-two thousand miles a day in an orbit which it will take nineteen million years to complete. The Pleiades appear in the springtime, and are associated with flowers and genial warmth and good weather. The navigation of the Mediterranean was from May to November—the rising and the setting of the Pleiades. The priests of Belus noticed that rising and setting two thousand years before Christ.

Now the glorious meaning of my text is plain as well as radiant. To give Job the beautiful grace of humility God asked him: "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades?" Have you any power over the laws of gravitation? Can you modify or change an influence wielded by a star more than four hundred thousand miles away? Can you control the winds of the springtime? Can you call out the flowers? How little you know compared with omniscience! How little you can do compared with omnipotence!

The probability is that Job had been tempted to arrogance by his vast attainments. He was a metallurgist, a zoologist, a poet, and shows by his writings he had knowledge of hunting, of music, of husbandry, of medicine, of mining, of astronomy, and perhaps was so far ahead of the scholars and scientists of his time that he may have been somewhat puffed up. Hence this interrogation of my text. And there is nothing that so soon takes down human pride as rightly thrust. Christ used it mightily. Paul mounted the parapet of his great arguments with such a battery. Men of the world understand it. Demosthenes began his speech on the crown, and Cicero his oration against Catiline, and Lord Chatham his most famous orations with a question. The empire of ignorance is so much vaster than the empire of knowledge that after the most learned and elaborate disquisition upon any subject of sociology or theology the plainest man may ask a question that will make the wisest speechless. After the profoundest assault upon Christianity the humblest may make an inquiry that would silence a Voltaire.

Called upon, as we all are at times, to defend our holy religion, instead of argument that can always be answered by argument, let us try the power of interrogation. We ought to be loaded with at least half a dozen questions and always ready, and when Christianity is assailed, and we are told there is nothing in it, and there is no God, and there never was a miracle, and that the Scriptures are unreasonable and cruel, and that there never will be a judgment day, take out of your portable armory of interrogation something like this: "What makes the condition of woman in Christian lands better than in heathen lands? Do you think it would be kind in God to turn the human race into a world without any written revelation to explain and encourage and elevate and save? And if a revelation was made, which do you prefer—the Zenda-Vesta of the Persian, or the Confucian writings of the Chinese, or the Koran of Mohammed, or our Bible? If Christ is not a divine being, what did he mean when he said, 'Before Abram was, I am?' If the Bible is a bad book, where are the evil results of reading it? Did you see any degrading influence of the book in your father, or mother, or sister, who used to read it? Do you not think that a judgment day is necessary in order to explain and fix up things that were never explained or fixed up? If our religion is illogical and an imposition upon human credulity, why were Herschel and Washington and Gladstone and William McKinley its advocates? How did it happen that our religion furnished the theme for the greatest poem ever written, Paradise Lost, and to the painters their greatest themes in the 'Adoration of the Magi,' 'The Transfiguration,' 'The Last Supper,' 'The Crucifixion,' 'The Entombment,' 'The Last Judgment,' and that all the schools of painting put forth their utmost genius in presenting 'The Madonna'?"

Why was it that William Shakespeare after amazing the world as he will amaze all centuries, with the splendor and power of The Merchant of Venice, and Coriolanus, and Richard the Third, and King Lear, and Othello, and Macbeth, and Hamlet, wrote with his own hand his last will and testament, beginning it with the words: "In the name of God, amen! I, William Shakespeare, of Stratford-on-Avon, in the county of Warwick, in perfect health and memory (God be praised!), do make and ordain this my last will and testament through the only merits of Jesus Christ, my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlasting, and my body to the earth whereof it is made?" Had Shakespeare lost his reason when he wrote his faith in Christ and the great atonement? Put your antagonist a few questions like that, and you will find him excusing himself for an engagement he must meet immediately, or he will start on a retreat like that which our Northern troops made for yonder Long Bridge after the battle of Manassas. A discourse on God's omnipotence and man's limitations would not have had such an effect upon Job as the interrogation of the text: "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?"

Ancestral Influences

These words also recognize far-reaching influences. Job probably had no adequate idea of the distance of the worlds mentioned from our world, but he knew them to be far off; and we, who have the advantage of modern sidereal investigation ought to be still more impressed than was Job with the question of the text, as it puts before us the fact that worlds hundreds of thousands of miles distant have a grip on our world. There are influences which hold us from afar. There may have been in our ancestral line perhaps two hundred years ago, some consecrated man or woman who has held over all the generations since an influence for good which we have no power to realize, and we, in turn, by our virtue or vice, may influence those who shall live two hundred years from now. Moral gravitation is as powerful as material gravitation, and if, as my text teaches and science confirms, the Pleiades, which are millions of miles from our earth influence the earth, we ought to be impressed with how we may be influenced by others far away back, and how we may influence others far down the future. That rill away up amongst the Alleghanies, so thin, you think it will hardly find its way down the rocks, becomes the mighty Ohio rolling into the Mississippi and rolling into the sea. That word you utter, that deed you do, may augment itself as the years go by until rivers cease to roll, and the ocean itself shall be dried up in the burning of the world. Paul, who was all the time saying important things, said nothing more startlingly suggestive than when he declared: "None of us liveth or dieth to himself." Words, thoughts, actions, have an eternity of flight. As Job could not bind the sweet influences of the Seven Stars, as they were called, so we cannot arrest or turn aside the good projected long ago. Those influences were started centuries before our cradle was rocked, and will reign centuries after our graves are dug. O, it is a tremendous thing to live! God help us to live aright.

Astronomers can easily locate the Pleiades. They will take you into their observatories on a clear night, and aim their revealing instrument toward the part in the heavens where those seven stars have their habitude, and they will point to the constellation Taurus, and you can see for yourself. But it is impossible to point to influences far back that have affected our character and will affect our destiny. We know the influences near by—paternal, maternal, conjugal—but by the time we have gone back two generations, or at most three, our investigations falter and fail. Through the modern interesting habit of searching back to find the ancestral tree, we may find a long list of names, but they are only names. The consecration or abandonment of some one two hundred years ago was not recorded. It would not be so important if you and I, by our good or bad behavior, blessed or blasted only those immediately around us, but our goodness or our badness will reach as far as the strongest ray of Alcyone—yea! across the eternities. Under this consideration, what do you think of those who give themselves up to frivolity or idleness, and throw away fifty years of their existence as though they were shells or pebbles or pods, instead of embryo eternities?

I suppose one of the greatest surprises of the next world will be to see what wide, far-reaching influence for good or evil we have all exerted. I am speaking of ourselves, who are only ordinary people. But who can fully appreciate the far-reaching good done by men of wealth in Great Britain for the working classes? Mr. Lister, of Bradford; Edward Akroyd, of Halifax;

Thomas Sikes, of Huddersfield; Joseph Wentworth, and Josiah Mason, and Sir Titus Salt. This last soul, with his vast wealth, provided 756 houses at a rent for three thousand working people, and cricket and croquet ground, and concert hall, and savings bank where they might deposit some of their earnings, and life insurance for those who looked further ahead, and bath-houses, and parks, and museums, and lecture halls with philosophical apparatus, the generous example of those men of a previous generation being copied in many places in Canada and the United States, making life, which would otherwise be a prolonged drudgery, an inspiration and a joy.

At Dunfermline, Scotland, is a stone house, the one on the second floor twelve feet by fourteen in area. The annual rent of that room years ago was $100. That was the one room in which the father and mother of Andrew Carnegie lived with the whole family. Influences were started there which made Andrew Carnegie the most distinguished philanthropist of our time, and what his gifts of great libraries on both sides of the sea will do for the coming generations I do not think any angel of God would have enough capacity to calculate. Who could bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades?

After a while, there will be a man who will do for churches and missionary societies and Bible distribution what Andrew Carnegie has done for libraries, and the millennium will be here. As the snow-drops bloom to January, and the honeysuckle to June, and the carnations to November, so this bloom and fragrance of generosity on the part of the world's wealth mark the advancing summer of the world's release, of Eden restored, of paradise regained. You say there are things to discourage. I know it. But I am not now expounding sepulchres full of dead men's bones and all unclean. I am watching the day-break. I am studying the light that streams into the darkness. I am considering the sweet influences of the Pleiades.

Notice also in my text the influence of other worlds upon this world. We all regard the effect which our continent has upon other continents or one hemisphere upon the other hemisphere. Great harvest or drought on one side of our world affects the other side of our world. A panic in Wall street, New York, has its echo in Lombard street and the Bourse. The nations of the earth cablegrammed together, all feel the same thrill of delight or shock or woe. But we do not appreciate the influence of other worlds upon our world. The scope of my text rouses us to the consideration. It takes us to the worlds of known and unknown astronomy to see our world in its orbit.

Every World Dependent

on other worlds. The influence is felt all through the heavens. Every constellation is a sisterhood. Our planet feels the benediction of Alcyone and the influence of the other stars of the Pleiades. Yea! there are two worlds that decide the fate of our world—its redemption or its demolition. Those two worlds are the quarters of angelology and demonology. From the one world came Christ, come ministering spirits, come gracious influences. From the other world rise all sin and diabolic influences. From that world of moral gloom rose the power that wrecked our poor world six thousand years ago, and all the good work done since then has not been able to get our world out of the brems. But the signals of distress have been hoisted and the lifelines are out, and our world's release is certain. The good influences of the consecrated people of our world will be centupled by the help from the heavenly world, and the divine power will overcome the demoniac. O, man! O, woman! Expand your idea and know the magnitude of a contest in which three worlds are specially interested. From all the seven worlds, which my text calls the Pleiades, there come no such powerful influences as from the two worlds that I am now mentioning. My only hope for this world is reinforcement that is to come from another world. But that is promised, and so I feel as sure of the rectification of all evil as though looking out of my window to-day I saw the parks and the gardens flowing into another paradise, and the apocalyptic angels flying through the midst of heaven with the new kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord.

My text called Job and calls us to consider "the influences." We put too much emphasis upon the acidities of life, upon the irritations of life, upon the disappointments of life. Ammianus Marcellinus said that Chaldea was, in olden times, overrun with but many of them lost their power because the swamps produced many gnats, that would get in the eyes of the lions, and the lions, to free themselves would claw their own eyes out, and then starve. In our time many a lion has been overcome by a The little, stinging annoyances of life keep us appreciating the sweet influences. And how many of these last there are! Sweet influences of however plain it may be! That is the harbor in which we sail. There we lay out our plans. We extend our sympathies. There we talk over our successes. There we unload our griefs. Its four shut out a prying and inquisitive world. Thank God for the home in which we were born, the home in which we now live, the home in which we expect to die! It sufficiently do we recognize the sweet influences of a wife. We men are of a rougher mold, and our is loud, and our manners need to be tamed, and meanness is not as much of a characteristic as it ought to be, and we often say things we ought to take back. It to change this that the good wife comes in. The interests of the twain are identical. Sweet influences make us better men than we otherwise would have been, or could have been! The last chapter of Proverbs recognizes the good wife's influence when it says: "A husband is known in the gates when he sitteth among the elders of the land." That is, his apparel indicates that he has someone to look after his wardrobe, his manners show that he is under refining influence at home. But no one fully appreciates the sweet influences of the wife, until the dark day comes, and the symptoms become serious, and the serious phases of disorder pass into the fatal, and the temperature rises, and medical ingenuity is exhausted, and you are left for your consolation that, "while there is life there is hope," which means that there is no hope at all, and the precious life flutters, and is gone, and you must put your sight the one who from the day she took the vow on the orange blossoms under the marriage bell, had been to you more than all the world beside. Then you gaze as never before what had been the sweet influence of friendship! If we have behaved ourselves tolerably well, we have friends. In our days of youth they come with their congratulations. In times of sorrow they come with expressions of solace. In times of perplexity they come with their advice. They are with us at weddings and at burials. If there is anything good in us they find it out, and our frailties they overlook or excuse. If something appears against us they say: "Wait till I hear the other side." If disaster shall befall us we know from whom would come the first condolence. Family friends; church friends; business friends; lifelong friends. In our heart of hearts we cherish them. Sweet influences of our holy religion, surrounded, as we are, by all the amenities of Christian society—men and women who have felt the refining and elevating power of the Gospel! Sweet influences of the Sabbath—fifty-two of them chiming their joy into every year! Sweet influences of the Scriptures, with their balm for all wounds and their light for every darkness! When the heirs of a vast estate in England wished to establish their claim to property worth one hundred million dollars, they offered a reward of five hundred dollars for the recovery of an old Bible, the family record of which contained the evidence requisite. But any Bible, new or old, can help us to a vaster inheritance than the one spoken of, one that never fades away. The sweet influences of the heavenly world, which many wise men thought for a long while was Alcyone, the centre of the constellation of the Pleiades—world of our future residence, as we hope; world of chorus and illumination; world of reunion; world where we shall be everlastingly complete; world where our old faculties will be intensified and quickened and new faculties implanted; world of high association with Christ, through whose grace we got there at all, and apostles, and poets Habakkuk, and St. John of Patmos; and Hannah More and Mrs. Hemans and Miss Sigourney, who struck their harps till nations listened; and David, the victor over Goliath with what seemed insufficient weapons; and Joshua of the prolonged day in Gibeon; and Havelock, the evangelist hero, and those thousands of men of the sword who fought on the right side. What company to move in! What guests to entertain! What personages to visit! What choirs to chant! What banquets with lifted chalices filled with "the new wine of the kingdom!" What victories to celebrate! The stories of that world and its holy hilarities come in upon our soul, sometimes in song, sometimes in sermon, sometimes in hours of solitary reflection, and they are, to use the words of my text, sweet influences. But there is one star that affects us more with its sweet influences than the centre star,—the Alcyone of the Pleiades,—and that is what one Bible author calls the Star of Jacob, and another Bible author calls the Morning Star. Of all the sweet influences that have ever touched our earth, those that radiate from Christ are the sweetest. Born an Asiatic villager, in a mechanic's home, living more among hammers and saws and planes than among books, yet at twelve years of age confounding robed ecclesiastics, and starting out on a mission under which those born without optic nerve took in the clear daylight, and those afflicted with unresponsive tympanum were made to hear, and those almost doubled up with deformities were straightened into graceful poise, and the leprous became rubicund, and the widow's only son exchanged the bier on which he lay lifeless, for the arms of his overjoyed mother; and pronouncing nine benedictions on the Mount of Beatitudes, and doing deeds and speaking words which are filling the centuries with sweet influences. Christ started every ambulance, kindled every electric ray, spread every soft hospital pillow, and introduced all the alleviations and pacifications and rescues and mercies of all time. He was the loveliest being who ever trod our earth—more beauty in his eye, more tenderness in his manner, more gentleness in his footstep, more music in his voice, more dignity in his brow, more gracefulness in the locks that rolled upon his shoulders, more compassion in his soul. Sweet influences of the Holy Ghost, with all his transforming and comforting and emancipating power. When that power is fully felt there will be no more sins to pardon, and no more wrongs to correct, and no more sorrows to comfort, and no more bondage to break. But, as the old-time ship captains watched the rising of the Pleiades for safe navigation and set sail in Mediterranean waters, but were sure to get back into port before the constellation Orion came into sight,—the season of cyclone and hurricane,—so there is a time to sail for heaven, and that is while the sweet influences are upon us, and before the storms overtake the delay. Open all your soul to the light and warmth and comfort and inspiration of that Gospel which has already peopled heaven with millions of the ransomed, and is helping other millions to that glorious destination. Do not postpone the things of God and eternity till the storms of life swoop and the agitations of a great future are upon us. Do not dare wait until Orion takes the place of the Pleiades. Weigh anchor now, and with chart unrolled, and pilot on board, head for the reunions and raptures that await all the souls forgiven. "And they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever."

GIRL-LIFE IN AN INDIAN TRIBE

MISS STANDING YELLOW MISS RUNNING WATER MRS. SQUAW MAN AND BABY NELLIE LONE WOLF ANNIE AND MARY DEERFOOT MISS YELLOW BEAR

ARENTAL lack of interest, so generally ascribed to the training of an Indian maiden, is found to have its existence only in the minds of those who do not understand the Indians. When one tries to know the exact conditions surrounding a reservation girl of from ten to twenty, he concludes that few girls of any race are watched more closely than those reared to womanhood by Indian parents. While scholastic education has not until recently played such an important part in the life of the redskin maiden, other things required strict tutelage, even in the days. She was instructed in those primitive arts which would enable her to keep her husband's fire, and that would prepare her for the tasks of amusements and pleasing his lordship of the camp and caring for his little red babies. She was taught modesty, the principles of virtue were drilled into her, and faithfully another imparted to her the thousand-and-one things which would make life one of morality and industry. The Indian girl of to-day must go away to school at five and remain there until she has mastered all the lessons given by Government school teachers. She is divested of her blanket, and taught how to clothe herself neatly and well like a white girl. Her clothes are made by her own hands, at first awkwardly, but later with dispatch and precision. The papoose is reared nowadays in either a small two-room government house or a tepee. She is allowed to play in the dirt and with toads, frogs and other wild things until she is five years old; then her education commences. Her school-life is much the same as that of her white sister; an Indian girl, however, learns more rapidly and remembers longer. She is quickly an adept at penmanship, spelling and geography. Grammar is her most difficult study. Their teachers find Indian girl students excelling in deportment. It is not much more than five years since an Osage chieftain auctioned off his favorite daughter for 100 ponies, the same being the highest price offered by a score or more of Indian bucks. It was the cause of so much opposition that the Government finally put a stop to this. Now the Indian girl can choose her own husband,—a plan which may not suit the parents, but elopements have become a matter of such common event in the Indian country that a girl's preference is not often opposed. The future of the Indian girls of the reservations of the Southwest is bright. Government statistics prove that every year they are casting aside more and more their blankets and other evidences of barbarity, in donning the garments and taking up the ways of the pale-faces. The old Indians, whether they can be induced to part with their ancient customs or not, are in favor of putting their daughters in school, that they may be prepared to take their places in the world. In the West it may seem strange to pass through an Indian village to-day, and find Indian girls mastering the typewriter and studying a short-hand book; but such are the sights one beholds. The photographs given show the typical Indian maiden and woman of to-day. Miss Standing Yellow belongs to the Silver Moon Poncos; Miss Running Water is a Caddo Indian; Miss Nellie Lone Wolf, a Kiowa; Misses Deerfoot are Wichitas; Miss Yellow Bear is a Comanche. Thus, one sees in all the tribes, cultured, intelligent young women coming forward to take up the Red Man's problems, and solve them by teaching a rising generation the ways of civilization and of Christianity. "Good News to the Poor" * Israel Oppressed in Egypt

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 10.

EXODUS 1:1-24

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT -- EXODUS 2:24: GOD HEARD THEIR GROANING AND REMEMBERED HIS COVENANT.

LIKE the man who faces what he must,
With step that is high and with heart of steel
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hopes fail, yet keeps unflinching trust
That God is good: that somehow, true and just,
His plans work out for mortals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,
Falls from his grasp—better with love a crust,
Than living in dishonor—envies not
Nor loses faith in man; but does his best,
Nor even murmurs at his humbler lot;
But, with a smile, and words of hope, gives zest
To every toiler: he alone is great
Who by life heroic conquers fate.

—SARAH K. BOLTON.

Genesis has told us of the formation of the world, now Exodus will tell us of the building of the chosen nation. It was all "God's building," even the hard toil on the treasure cities, which served as an industrial school for Israel to prepare them for the later building of the Tabernacle and the nation. The founders of the United States saw in the Exodus story the picture of their own nation building. To the American negroes it is the story of their own emancipation. Christians in every land have seen in this book the type of their pilgrimage from the bondage of sin, through the discipline of earthly trial, into the better life here, and the better land beyond.

Three timely topics in to-day's lesson: 1. Oppression. 2. Immigration. 3. Labor.

The Lesson Story

"An exile from home!" Such every Israelite felt himself to be in Egypt, especially after Joseph's death and the death of Aepi, the Pharaoh who honored him, left them without influential friends in a strange land. In the United States, in one or two generations an immigrant family ceases to feel alien, except in the case of one race, and that is the very race that kept itself a separate people in Egypt for hundreds of years.

The Egyptian Emperor or Pharaoh of Joseph's time, Aepi, was the last of the shepherd dynasty, which consisted of foreign rulers, such as the Manchu are in China to-day. He would not object to elevating Joseph, another foreigner, to the second place in the kingdom. But when the book of Exodus takes up the story, native rulers have long been restored to the throne, and, having frequent occasion to fight the Asiatic races, are afraid to have too many Asiatic immigrants, lest they join the enemy in some of these wars. In the first fourteen chapters of Exodus, which cover about a century, there were probably three Pharaohs—Seti, in the first chapter; Rameses II. in chapter two, and Menephtah I. in chapters five to fourteen. (The foregoing is condensed from George Rawlinson's Egypt and Babylon, which treats also the difficulty about the duration of the captivity. Compare Gen. 15: 13, 14; Ex. 12: 40, 41; Gal. 3: 17, which should not be allowed to crowd out the greater problems that need even more than the brief time allowed for lesson study in the class.) When Seti came to the throne, the Hittites, who are spoken of in the Bible as a great people, which sceptics thought an error until recent discoveries of inscriptions proved it, were threatening to give Egypt another conquest and another series of "Shepherd Kings," a term the Egyptians used in reproach, as if to intimate that their less educated and more vigorous conquerors were "outside barbarians." These Hittites had conquered Syria, and were threatening Egypt by an alliance of the foes of Egypt in Asia and North Africa, attacking from both sides. This was why Seti was so afraid to have nearly two millions of Hebrews in his land, who would sympathize with the Hittites because of a race affinity, and also because the Egyptians had, since Joseph's death, oppressed them, not by slavery, as we understand it, but by what is still known in despotic countries as corvee, or forced unpaid labor for the king, which is often no better than slavery. Seti compelled the Hebrews to build store cities, which were arsenals and granaries combined, and a wall like that of China on his Asiatic frontiers. His purpose was not alone to protect his frontiers against outside foes, but also to check by overwork the growth of his dangerous Hebrew immigrants, who had entered Egypt not more than two thousand in number (seventy heads of households and their families and following), and were now two millions. "He made their lives bitter with hard bondage." But God's blessing more than counterbalanced the Emperor's oppression, and still they increased. Let us hope that in their souls, as well as their bodies, they found God's blessing more than a match for man's curse.

This Bible story is at almost every point confirmed by the stone books of Egypt. Explorers have dug up "Rameses" and "Pithom," and found bricks made of dried clay with scant supply of straw to hold them together and with the name of Pharaohs of this very period stamped on them. Professor Dr. George Ebers, one of the greatest of Egyptologists, says: "The whole account agrees so exactly with the actual conditions of Egypt in the time of the nineteenth dynasty, at the close of which the exodus occurred, that we can scarcely doubt that we have, in this case, to do with old and true traditions." (Sunday School Times, May 7, 1887.) That some still doubt the Bible, whose truth has been a thousand times confirmed by such explorations, is but a new illustration of the saying, "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one rose from the dead."

Illustration and Application

God heard their groaning. These words of our martyred President, dying of an Anarchist's bullet, "It's God's way; his will be done," still echo in many hearts, and raise strong questionings. "It's the devil's way," says one earnest Christian; another recalls in reply that in the story of Job, when Satan had despoiled him, the stricken man said, submissively and trustfully, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away." Is anarchy, and its opposite and prompting, despotism, "God's way?" Or is it the devil's way? Or is it man's own free way? When disaster comes to us by the fury of the storm, it is not so difficult to say, "God's will be done," as when we are wronged by some bad man, for an example, an Anarchist or an oppressor. But let us not so soon forget how God used the envy of Joseph's brethren and the lust and lies of Potiphar's wife, to fulfil his promise to Joseph of coronation and usefulness. Among the "all things" that "work together for good," we must include even anarchy and oppression, those twin hyenas of man's social life. But we, too, shall be working for good when we slay them both, as we must before the prayer can be answered. "Thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth."

"Why does not God kill the devil?" "Why does he not make evil impossible?" "How can man have his will and yet God have his way?" All these old questions, that we cannot settle, but which we should think about, underlie the old, old problem of the oppression of God's poor and the weak ones by his rich and strong enemies. In every age the oppressed have cried out, "Why is his chariot so long in coming?" But history is full of instances where he has come, as in this Exodus story. When Frederick Douglass was speaking hopelessly of American slavery, Sojourner Truth arose and exclaimed, like a Miriam, "Frederick, is God dead?" It was not long before, through a Red Sea indeed, these slaves were brought out with a mighty hand. In every hour of sorrow and mystery let us say, "Thy will be done."

We see not, know not; all our way
Is night—with thee alone is day;
From out the torrent's troubled drift,
Above the storm our prayers we lift,
Thy will be done!

We take with solemn thankfulness
Our burden up, nor ask it less,
And count it joy that even we May suffer, serve, or wait for thee,
Whose will be done!

—JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Let us deal wisely with them. The United States is almost the only country in which foreigners are a serious problem.

In London and Berlin the foreign element is scarcely 2 per cent. In many American cities, and in some whole States, those of foreign parentage can outvote the native population. Commercially also the foreigners crowd the natives out of many a living. And when to all this is added the fact that the foreign Anarchists among us have recently killed a king and a President, we are prompted to deal severely in word and deed with our foreign element.

Immigration restriction should surely be undertaken in earnest, in protection of purity as well as property and life. Mormons, Anarchists and demi-monde should be rigidly excluded. This will not be easy, for there is an almost irresistible threefold alliance of the steamboat companies, the brewers and the priests, that has thus far defeated every adequate bill for restriction of immigration. But with all this let us have no hatred or oppression of foreigners as such, but treat them in the spirit of universal brotherhood. Let us not speak of "sheenees" and "daggoes," but count every man as the brother of Christ and so our brother also. Even the Old Testament law was, "Thou shalt not oppress a stranger, for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex. 23: 9). Even those foreigners who are not what they should be can be won to Christ by brotherly kindness. Especially should Christians in every town see that foreigners get Christian reading in their own beloved tongue.

PART OF PITHOM BUILT BY THE ISRAELITE.

Labor in Eden before the fall was surely not a curse, but overwork, work for too long hours a day; for seven days of six days in the week; unpaid work; a curse done in the spirit of oppression on one's fellow man. But even upon such work God put blessing. It is much for the laborer to know, as the Israelites did, that God is ever near to bless him. Every Christian workman is not being justly treated, even though he may be a slave, as was Joseph in Potiphar's home, and as the Israelites were in Egypt, his work may be faithfully done. Some good will come to the world out of good work even if he is not properly paid for it, as the story of this lesson the Israelites learned, in building cities for Pharaoh, mechanical arts for future use.

And let employers in the shop and the home consider whether they are not oppressing in body and mind the whom they employ. You abominate injustice in Egypt and in your nearest neighbor.

Search thine own heart. What paneth thee
In others, in thyself may be.
All dust is frail, all flesh is weak;
Be thou the true man thou dost seek.

At the time of Queen Victoria's death the following story was told by Rev. Dr. Wallace Williamson, to show how the same Gospel fits rich and poor, high and low.

One Gospel for All. "Not many autumns ago," he said, "I went to preach, as I often do, to the poorhouse of the poorhouse connected with the Edinburgh parish of St. Cuthbert's. Next morning a humble audience sent me, through the Governor, a warm note of thanks, telling me what help and comfort I had had from my sermon. Only a few days passed when I received a command from the Queen, then at Balmoral, to preach the following Sunday in the church of Crathie. What did I preach, think you? The very sermon I had preached in the poorhouse! After service, dining at the castle, and honored by her Majesty with a special drawing-room interview, she most graciously asked me to supply her with my own private view, with a copy of my sermon. It was a small encouragement," concluded Dr. Williamson, "that the poorhouse and the throne united in response to the Gospel." Another story shows how the Gospel yields beautiful fruits in a poorhouse saint, who is rich in faith.

"I went once to see a dying girl whom the world had roughly treated. She never knew her father or her mother; her home had been the poorhouse; her couch, the straw cot; and yet, as she staggered in her weakness, she picked up a little of the alphabet, enough to spell out the New Testament, and she had touched the hem of the Master's garment, and had learned the new song. She trembled in the presence of majesty as I did in the presence of her presence as she came near the crossing. 'Oh,' she said, 'God sends his angels. I have read in his Word that they not ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be the heirs of salvation?' And when I lay in my cot they stand about me on the floor, and when the heavy darkness comes, and this poor side aches so sorely, he comes, for he says, 'Lo, I am with you,' and I rest."

The gospel of Moses, Isaiah and Christ, as found in the 4th of Luke, is literally "good news to the poor" in the spirit of Christ, working through the convictions of men into actions and institutions, the wrongs the poor are made to have so long suffered from masters and rulers shall come to an end in an era of social justice, of which the year of jubilee was but a picture.

Every one shall help on that day who accepts the deliverance, typified in the story of Exodus, from the bondage of sin, through the blood of Christ our Passover. The bondage of sin includes both body and soul, for man's world. Its bondage need not wait for any heroes, for man's liberation is already provided and only waits their acceptance. The papers recently told a pathetic story of three negroes in the South who never till recently had heard the story of the Emancipation Proclamation, and have all these forty years worked as slaves under a hard master. Whether that is true or not, a more amazing thing is true, namely, that many men and women have known for forty years that God offers them freedom from the guilt and power and sin, and yet have refused this highest freedom.

THE STORY OF LITTLE YUTE-HO-JI

WHEN Mrs. McKinley was so very ill in San Francisco—on the occasion of the Presidential visit last summer—three of the small Chinese maids in this photograph carried her some flowers. They were Foon Ying, Tsun Fa and Foong Seen. The sick lady was so ill to see them that day, but the President (who has since then passed away) left her bedside for a moment, and on the landing of the stairs, shook hands with the three, accepted their flowers, bade them Good-bye and returned to his wife, and they, as heroines, to the Mission Home. The President's kindness reached the humblest Chinese child, as well as the loftiest of earth. There is great mourning among the Chinese children over his lamentable death, for they all knew the story of his kindness and had learned to love him. Now, when these Chinese children happen to be connected with international questions, as well as religious ones, especial interest centres around them. This is the case with the tiniest one in the Home. She is seated upon the lowest step in the photograph. Her name is Yute-Ho-Ji. She is one of the most fascinating children I have ever known. Whether her unconsciousness that she is being observed, or because she is unusually gifted, I cannot tell. Playing with the children about her, Yute-Ho-Ji little dreams what she has escaped, unless where in her childish brain is lodged the memory of cruelty. She was purchased in Hong Kong for the enormous sum of ten dollars, when only a year old, and brought to this country by a woman purporting to be her grandmother—one, who knew that in a few years she could sell the child for ten times that sum. She was trouble about the landing papers, and the man and child were sent by the Government officials to the Presbyterian Mission Home. There was no place except the jail or the Mission Homes, as they were wards of the Government, until it could be decided that they had or had not a right to land. They had only been in the Home a short time when it became apparent to all that the woman was not the mother of the child. The little one seemed terrified, and it was soon discovered that the woman was beating her for whatever she did, good or bad. The case was reported, the Collector of the Port advised matters, the "grandmother" left and the child remained.

The Tiny Slave Rescued

Free from the tyrannical power of the one she feared, the little one, like some flower brought into the sun, bloomed into great attractiveness. Her case interested many outsiders. The Grand Jury could not believe that such tiny ones were brought from China to be kept here and sold for slaves. They ordered Yute-Ho-Ji to appear before them. She went, accompanied by the Superintendent, Miss Cameron. So completely did she win all hearts, that the magistrates hurriedly visited the Mission Home to see the others, like this little one, were rescued from slavery. That was a year and a half ago. Yute-Ho-Ji is now a year and a half, and sings hymns alone, and in perfect English, and repeats Bible verses. It touches every heart, when, with imploring voice, she looks into a stranger's face and says, "Feed my lambs."

On the step above Yute in the photograph are Tsun Fa and Foong Seen. The first is a beautiful child, differing scarcely a shade of Chinese blood. Foong Seen is plain, but remarkably precocious. One Sunday when some older children had taken something from the church to "nibble" during the long service, they were upbraided for it after church. Foong Seen, near the front, seemed greatly interested in the conversation. Looking forward she said: "When I get to be a big girl I won't eat things in church. If I do, people will think I don't have any good teaching at the Mission Home." The honor of the Home is very dear to even the youngest child. They have been taught they must let their Christian light shine into the darkness of heathen Chinatown. Their voices are very sweet in song, and the Bible has been well learned by them. These three little ones are inseparable. Foong Seen is under the care of Chin Mui, the blind girl who was, when very small, shut up by relatives in a hen-coop for many years. She was rescued by a more humane Chinaman, brought to the Mission Home and there, thought protected by the oculists incurably blind, has received the greatest kindness. She cuts and makes Foong Seen's clothes, teaches the child new tunes and many hymns, and is a mother to the little one whose own mother gave her to the Home. Both Tsun Fa and Foong Seen were born in the Home, their mothers having been rescued and brought there.

A Little Chinese Endeavor Maid

Ah Lon (standing on the upper row) is one who became well known some years ago, when the Christian Endeavor Convention met in San Francisco. She was very small, but being an Endeavorer, she took part. She belongs to the Chinese Christian Endeavor Society in the Mission Home, and is a King's Daughter, of the Chinese Presbyterian Church. She was taken, when very young from one of the vile dens of Chinatown. When about five years old she surprised the Home by taking up an English Bible, and reading it as if she were an English child. Those hearing her thought it was some chatter with which she was familiar. They turned to the Old Testament and were indeed amazed to hear her read that equally well. When or how Ah Lon learned none ever knew. She has been, until quite recently, the alto singer in the choir of the Chinese Presbyterian Church. One Sunday not long ago, the organist failing to arrive in time, Ah Lon was asked to take her place. Without a moment's hesitation she walked to the organ, her little feet scarcely reaching far enough to touch the pedal, and played for the entire congregation as if she were accustomed to the place.

YUTE-HO-JI AND HER LITTLE CHINESE FRIENDS

A Chinese Mother's Sorrow

The smaller one next to Ah Lon is Foon Ying (Margaret) who still bears, and ever will, the mark of what she suffered because her mother would not renounce her Christian faith. The mother, Hoong Leen, was a girl rescued by Miss Culbertson many years ago. She was a pleasant Christian girl, but none dreamed how steadfast she could be. She became the wife of Woo Hip, a successful Chinese merchant in Los Angeles. They had a happy home, with two little children, a boy and girl. The father, also a Christian, was devoted to his old parents in China, and longed to take his wife and children to his old home and show them to his father. When they reached Hong Kong the husband was smitten with the plague, and reached his father's home violently insane. He died, and his young Christian wife and children were left with the heathen parents. Her little ones clung to her when they saw her grief at being bidden to go back to what they could not understand, ancestral worship. This she could not do. Then, at the heathen rites at the burial when the parents strove to appease the angry gods, she resolutely refused to take part. Nowhere would she bow down to idols. The angry parents charged her with being the cause of their son's death, and from that hour no mercy was shown her or little Foon Ying. The boy escaped cruel treatment because of the inordinate love of the Chinese for a boy; but life became a daily torture to the mother and the little girl. Then came the thought of help from the old Mission Home in San Francisco. She did not appeal in vain, and immediately upon receipt of the money, she left for America. She had borne up bravely, but the struggle had been too great. Hardly had the boat left China, when Hoong Leen's strength gave way. Day by day she grew worse, and soon knew that she must die. Surrounded by heathen Chinese on the steamer, with none to care for her, her only hope was in Christ, and her constant prayer was to be spared until she could place her little ones in the Mission Home. Her prayer was answered. She reached San Francisco, where, after intense suffering, she passed away. It was her dying request that Foon Ying might be trained for a medical missionary, and the boy for a minister, thus would they prove a blessing to heathen China. Her son, Ah On (Henry) has been placed in the Presbyterian Orphanage in San Anselmo.

A Child Heroine

Last and largest of the girls in the group is Ah Ching. During the "bubonic plague scare," two years ago, Chinatown was quarantined and barricaded, with policemen on guard at every corner. Yet this girl, alone and unprotected, passed the guard and flew to the Mission Home to implore the indefatigable superintendent to hasten to the bedside of her dying sister Leen Gow, that they might bring her to the Mission Home. The Christians who had helped her in her hour of distress, and cared for her dying sister, were the friends she wanted, and after that sister's death, the girl decided to remain at the mission. Vain were the continued pleadings of her relatives. They appealed to the court, but Ah Ching's straightforward replies convinced the court that they should give her to the Home, and Miss Cameron, to the child's delight, was appointed her legal guardian. She is in every way a remarkably gifted child. She has already expressed a desire to unite with the church, and will soon be enrolled with Ah Lon and scores of others of those "saved by grace," who are now members of the Chinese church of San Francisco.

Our Relief Work in China

Mr. Francis H. Nichols, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S special correspondent in China, who lately arrived at Peking on his way to Shansi and Shensi, has been most cordially received by the Chinese authorities. From Peking, October 15, he cabled that he had been provided with a military escort, and was about starting for Pao-tung-fu (in Shansi) and Singan-fu (in Shensi). He had met Prince Ching, the military Governor of Peking, at the latter's residence, by official invitation. The Prince informed him that the Emperor had personally desired that Prince Ching express China's thanks for America's generosity to the famine stricken people. Mr. Nichols reached Pao-tung-fu, October 18, and found THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief work making a great and favorable impression on officials and people. The Lieutenant-Governor personally expressed the deep gratitude of the province for the aid rendered. In Shensi, the famine is increasing. Rev. Dr. Duncan is doing excellent service at Singan-fu in relieving the distressed.

The Red Letter Bible sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfillment of the promise of all the ages.

If you want a Red Letter Bible send your order at once. The edition is Thirty Thousand, or one Bible for every ten subscribers. We cannot produce another edition before April 1. The work is very difficult. It requires greater care than it would be likely to receive at an outside establishment. Hence, the printing is done at our own extensive plant. And even with these extraordinary facilities, it takes nearly six months to produce an edition. There are Sixteen Hundred Pages, many in Two Colors, and it is the accurate two-color work which takes the time. Subscribe to-day, and thus make sure of a copy.

Our Gift of Seed to India

BOMBAY, Aug. 7, 1901.

THAT consignment of seed, so long on the way, is being distributed all over India, and will be a great blessing to very many. We have packed and sent out twenty-five large lots of it, and are getting very grateful letters in return. The responses to my notice in the papers were more numerous than I had anticipated, but we will do our best to send some to all. It is distributed only to missionaries in charge of orphanage gardens and farms. The delay will not greatly, if at all, hinder it being planted in good time. It is a fine gift, and I wish we might get another lot next year.

Yours very truly, (Rev.) W. H. STEPHENS.

Ransomed with Gold

CRIME is kaleidoscopic. The latest phase in the changing features of perpetrating great outrages is to demand vast sums of money from those who suffer at the hands of criminals. Demanding a ransom at the risk of their victims being murdered, and upon terms that will protect the guilty party, seems to be the favorite method. The son of a Western millionaire was, a short while ago, abducted by a brutal thug, named Pat Crowe, who, in cold blood, demanded an enormous sum of money, and promising, if paid, the boy would be returned in safety, but if not, would suffer death. The money was paid by the anxious and anguish-stricken parents, and the son came home to tell a tale of horror. His abductors now stipulate to the police terms on which they are willing to surrender themselves to justice. A beloved missionary of the A. B. C. F. M., Miss Stone, is now held as a captive in the mountains of Bulgaria by a band of murderous brigands, and they also demand as a ransom a vast sum of money. Shall this latter be paid, as it was in the case of young Cudahy?

Are we justified in paying these enormous amounts, thus establishing dangerous precedents, and perpetuating the most horrible of crimes? Can we afford to suffer the loss of such valuable, promising and beautiful lives by our withholding the ransom money demanded? Not to comply with the demand, and pay the price promptly seems like assenting to their death; while to hasten with our gold, and pour out our treasure seems like compounding the awful guilt of these murderous hordes. No sum of money, be it ever so large, can ever be named as a true standard of valuation of a human life. There are gradations also of value, some lives ranking far higher than others in the service of their country and in the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. We hesitate not to say, Miss Stone must be ransomed with gold, cost what it may! No amount of money can be regarded as an over-valuation of her precious life. Jesus Christ paid a far higher price, his own blood, as an infinite ransom for her soul.

But when we say this we are also convinced that our great Republic, that guarantees protection to all born under the flag, must, as a duty it owes itself and all our citizens, first notify the great powers that if such a price is paid, and the captive liberated, the money shall be returned by the Government under which the crime has been enacted. It must be as clearly understood that if her sacred life be taken because the money is not paid, that Government shall also be held responsible by the United States. Brigandage as outlawry must find no toleration or protection in any country, far less from a Christian nation.

If it is asked how could such a vast sum of money be repaid by a bankrupt power—and how could it be collected? We answer, that while we are in favor of universal peace with all the powers, and abhor war, and would do all in our power to avert any international struggle, yet, if "it must needs be that offenses come" the all-persuasive power of the presence of our war ships, and eloquence of our guns would soon settle the claim of the blood-money being restored. To pay this immense amount of money to the brigands and count the case closed, without protest from the United States Government, means to imperil the lives of all our missionaries and travelers in these brigand-infested countries. Redeem the captive at once but insist that the price of her redemption shall be made good by the powers that protect these murderous hordes.

In the case of Crowe vs. Cudahy, there ought to be no compromise with the ruffian and no agreement upon the terms laid down by the self-confessed criminal. This is compounding crime and is a menace to the life of our Republic. Law must be honored. The majesty of justice must be upheld, and to comply with the stipulations of the fugitive from justice is to play into the hands of the criminal element, and endanger the young lives of other wealthy citizens prospective heirs to vast estates. Better far that a much larger sum of money shall be paid to the scientific detective agencies, to hound and ferret out and punish the guilty conspirators according to due process of law, and thus deter the criminal element from repeating such infamous outrages!

Is War Necessary?

ELSEWHERE in this issue will be found, presented fully and frankly both sides of a controversy which cannot fail to interest every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Hudson Maxim, the inventor of the most powerful explosive known to science, and one whose name has been identified for many years with the grim paraphernalia of war, writes in support of the proposition that the sanguinary strife of nations is a necessity, that it tends to the advancement of civilization, and that whatever helps civilization helps Christianity. This is the world's view, which urges that peace can only be secured through war; that there is "Bible warrant" for fighting, and that it is useless to indulge the hope of an enduring peace on earth.

But while the Christian's confident expectation of a period of lasting peace coming to bless mankind may be regarded as "foolishness" by the learned of the earth, who have little in common with the children of faith, he is, nevertheless, justified in praying, looking and working for the coming of that day. Peace! the sweetest of all the material gifts heaven sends to humanity, for it brings happiness and prosperity in its train. The believer sees in the spread of Christianity throughout the nations a sure sign of the ultimate realization of that promise of "peace on earth and good will," which was sung over Bethlehem, and foretold, long ages ago, by the holy prophets and sages. Up from the dark depths of sin and savageism toward light and Christianity, the world is still slowly struggling. It took ages to convince man that his fellow-man was not his slave; that murder was a crime; that the poorest serf had rights and human feelings; that justice belonged to all men alike; that tyranny and brutality carried their own punishment. It may take many more years to compel world-wide recognition of the truth that war is barbarism, and that no principle is ever really settled by resort to violence; but that day is even now on the way, and will come as sure as to-morrow's sunrise. In that time the "debt which civilization owes to gunpowder" will be recalled with shuddering, and men will wonder how their progenitors could ever have indulged in the "great game of war," with all its gory and inhuman accompaniments.

Dr. Talmage's contribution to the discussion voices this hope very clearly. "The last wars of the world are now being fought; I expect to see the last cannon spiked." May the time come soon! So while war may, in the present condition of the world's affairs, be apparently unavoidable, let us hold fast to the hope that the transformation of the race may not be so far distant, when arbitration and universal peace will everywhere prevail.

The Time of Fruit Harvest

IN the matchless beauty of the autumnal days, there is something which appeals to that side of man's nature which springtime with its buds and blossoms, and full-foliaged summer with its wealth of woodland music, its "langours and its lilies," may not reach. It is the season of rest and thankfulness and the poet interprets its spirit aright:

In autumn-time, when fruits are ripe,
And nature yieldeth offering sweet,
And all the world lies calm and still
And grateful, at the Maker's feet,
Then man lifts up his heart and says:
"O, Father, for thy fruits and flowers,
For sunny days and gracious showers,
And treasures of golden wheat,
We thank thee now, in reverence meet."

The time of the falling of the leaves is the year's holiday-time. Such work as remains to be done in fruitful field, orchard, or garden, is as play compared to the springtime's ploughing and sowing and summer's hoeing and reaping. Golden pumpkins decorating the ground only wait to be lifted to the wagons. Tomato vines are simply to be torn up against Jack Frost's coming, and hung in some friendly corner of the garret or barn, to go on yielding their ripening treasures for some time to come. Stalks of roasting ears stacked nearby keep them company. And, if down South, maybe a few watermelons, tucked in a snug nest of holly leaves, their chance of doing duty as a novelty on Thanksgiving, even at Christmas feast. Late berries and wood-piles spread on boards, are drying in the sun. In Florida and California, Cuba, and Porto Rico, where it is fruit almost all the year round, folks are wondering what the next orange yield will be. That may not be known until January and March. It is not altogether ill that some of our fruit crop is short; otherwise, we might take our earnings too much as a matter of course. This year the yield is only half of what it was last; the same is true of the wheat crop. There is a silver lining to the cloud, however, for farmers are getting good prices for all the fruit they have.

While the fruits and nuts are being stored away, blackberry logs rolled under the shed, prophesy of sparkling merry games, toasting apples, and roasting chestnuts, popping corn, nice stories, pleasant chats, and long evenings crowded to the brim with home pleasures. Perhaps the next evenings will furnish happy opportunities for the conclusion of courtships begun at the ingathering of the apples! Fun, to be sure, there is in an apple harvest! The young men and maidens, old folks, the children, the hired man, the city visitor, help. The ladder is set to the side of the tree and up climb adventurous pluckers of crimson, green and striped beauties hanging on the bough. Polly holds her apron, and Robin, tossing apples down, looks into her eyes. The delightful things his bashful tongue has not yet dared to utter. And grandfather and grandmother, sitting in the sun, smilingly recall the days of their youth. "Now," says he, "it is life's autumn with us. Presently, the snow will come and we shall be folded away, but not to sleep always. God has all seasons for his own."

HEAVEN, HOME and HAPPINESS

OUR NEW
BOOK -- BY MARY LOWE
DICKINSON

MYRTA LOCKETT AVARY, who has been associated with Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson in the preparation of this great work, writes:

In this volume, we have tried to show what the poets, preachers and teachers, the hymn writers, the story-tellers, the historians, the busy men and women of affairs have said and thought about Heaven, Home and Happiness—the three themes dearest to the human heart, representing separately and in unity what all the world's a-seeking.

How to make a true home; how to be happy oneself and how to enlarge the happiness of others; how to win Heaven at last and what Heaven may be like when we are there, are all told in this work in the words of the world's noblest and best thinkers and doers. Every one is better for reading this book; every home will be brighter and happier for its presence. Every one should be a reader of Heaven for reading it; and every one, we believe, will have more comfortable thoughts about the dear ones gone before. The bereaved wife or husband, the desolate orphan, the mother parted from her child, the lover grieving for the beloved, the friend mourning for the friend, will each find here some special word of hope, just fitted to his or her case, from some great-hearted soul who has suffered and found comfort.

Who but faint would know how to be happy? Happiness is not luck, not accident, not the result of God's favor for this or that child. It is a science; it should be a study.

To be happy is at once duty and privilege. The selections in this department are helpful in that they go to show what happiness consists; how it may be attained and maintained in spite of circumstances. And then there are many other some bits given just for the sake of the smile they will bring. Ancient and modern authors have been drawn upon; celebrities over seas and celebrities at home; hymns, stories and poems that have become classics of the household have been laid under tribute. Nameless flowers—humble little wayside blossoms—have been gathered, too, because their sweetness justified the plucking. Folk-lore plays its part, and the old Plantation melody is not missing from our store of ballad and blossom.

Perhaps with all our care, some favorite may be missing. If so, we shall be sorry, for we want this book to perfect the need of many hearts. It would be impossible to put in a volume many times this size all that, the world's readers have said about these tremendous themes. So our effort has been to cull carefully and tenderly from each garden of thought its fairest flower, and bind these together as a fragrant offering for the table around which the family circle gathers for pleasant evening hours.

This superb volume is sent with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year on receipt of only Two Dollars. If you really want it subscribe at once. The book would make a beautiful Christmas gift.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Protestant Episcopal Convention

MANY important matters were considered by the General Episcopal Convention, which has now closed its sessions in San Francisco. The sessions were held in the beautiful church on the corner of Bush and Gough streets, which was recently consecrated for Trinity Parish. The presiding Bishop of the church, the Right Rev. Thomas M. Clark, of Rhode Island, being now ninety years of age and in declining health, was unable to make the journey to San Francisco. His duties were performed by other bishops, among whom was the Right Rev. William C. Doane, of Albany, N. Y. Each diocese sent four clergymen and four laymen to represent in the house of deputies. Its President was Rev. Morgan Dix, of Trinity Church, New York, who has occupied that office fifteen years past. He, however, was unable to attend, and Rev. John S. Idsary, of Massachusetts, was elected in his place. A leading member of this house was Dr. William R. Huntington, of Grace Church, New York, whose speeches were heard with close attention, and who had charge of several important measures. One of these measures was designed to admit to the church certain religious societies, chiefly Scandinavians, who are practically in accord with the church, but on a ritual of their own. Dr. Huntington pleaded eloquently for the change, which might ultimately have widened the doors of fellowship, but it was lost by a small technical vote. The principle of change was, however, admitted by resolution, in qualified form, at a later session. Other proposals were for a change in the name of the church, which was referred to a committee to report at the next Convention in 1904. Another subject was that of giving the clergy the right to use readings from the Revised Version in the Church services. This, also, was referred to a committee. The question in which most interest was felt by the public was that of divorce. The proposed change forbade clergymen officiating at the marriage of divorced persons, and persons from whom they were divorced were still living. The house of Deputies passed that change in the canon, but it was lost in the house of Deputies. Missionary Bishops elected were Dr. Hall for Hankow, China; Dr. Brown for Porto Rico; Dr. Brent for the Philippines; Dr. Keator for Olympia, Wash.; and Rev. Cameron Mann for North Dakota. The result of the Convention appears to have been a disappointment both for the conservatives and the liberals, the measures advocated by both having failed to pass. As in the early church, the leaders were men differing in temperament, honesty and sincerely holding different views of truth.

BISHOP H. C. POTTER

The Cost of Royal Society

Tourists returning from Europe complain of the imposition practiced upon them at several hotels during their journey on the continent. On arriving in a French city or at a Swiss or German watering place they would go to the best hotel, expecting to pay the prices usually charged at such establishments. It often happened that the King of Belgium or some other royal person, or some Russian grand duke would be pointed out to them as they dined in the restaurant of the fall of those they love. They may be encouraged by the knowledge that to such cries the ear of Christ is ever open.

When he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, unto him that was the hotel. The royalties have been scattered rather thickly over the continent of late, seeking restoration of health, and as a rule they preferred taking their meals in company rather than in stately solitude in their rooms. The visitors were naturally interested in seeing the illustrious personages, but when their bills were presented they found they were charged double or treble prices for everything. On protesting, they were reminded of the distinguished company they had been keeping, and were told that such a privilege was well worth the extra money. Not all the Americans thought it so, though doubtless there were guests who were well content to pay for such privileges. Unhappily, an infinitely higher honor which may be had without money is too often despised:

If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me (Rev. 3: 20).

Saved by his Dog

Some anxiety was felt at Laurel, Del., recently about a hunter, who had been absent from his home for four days. He had started out with his dog to hunt for coons, intending to return on the next day. He was seen entering a dense forest and no one saw him afterwards. Searching parties went in various directions, but without finding trace of him. At last, on the fourth day, a dog was heard howling by one of the searching parties in the forest. They made their way to the part from which the sound came, and there found the animal, who led them to an old well. They could not see the bottom, but one of the party was lowered by a rope, and there at the bottom was the missing hunter, weak and unconscious. He was drawn up and carried to his home. The four days he had spent in the empty well, had been days of utter despair. They would have ended in his death if his dog had deserted him. The dog could not save him, but he stayed with him, and his cries brought those who could save him. This is the position of many who deplore able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared (Heb. 5: 7).

Breaking Into Jail

A jail is a building which one would have thought was safe from burglars, but a press despatch from Rochester, N. Y., reports that a burglary was committed a few days ago on the jail at Wayland. A constable and his son always sleep there. On the night in question the constable, while preparing to retire after a late visit to the cells, heard a stealthy noise, and on proceeding to a room from the window of which there was a view of the outside of the jail, he saw two men sawing the strong iron bars of a window a few yards away. He aroused his son, and the two men, having armed themselves, went to the room just as the two burglars crawled through the aperture they had made. They were immediately overpowered and locked up in cells. They explained that they thought the building was a bank, having been misled by the strong bars at the windows. They must have deplored their folly in breaking into a building in which there was nothing to steal and in which only punishment could be expected. They would not have done so if they had known, but there are many who show similar folly in entering the service of the evil one in spite of the warnings of God's word:

He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me, love death (Prov. 8: 36).

Ashore in a Fog

Thrilling stories are told by the passengers rescued from the wrecked steamer Hating, of the Canadian Pacific Line, who arrived at Vancouver, B. C., from the Klondike, on October 14. They say that at times during the voyage, the fog was so dense that an object three feet ahead of the ship's bows could not have been seen. The captain and mate were on the bridge peering into the fog. All the passengers were on deck, all anxious about their safety. As the narrowest part of the channel was reached a sudden gust of wind lifted the fog momentarily. In that instant the captain saw rocks to the right, fifty feet ahead. He signalled to reverse the engines, but it was too late. The vessel by her own headway ran into a narrow groove between two jagged ridges and held fast. One foot either way would have resulted in a crash that would have sent her to the bottom. Great holes were stove in her side, through which the water poured, but held up by the ridges on either hand, there was time to get the passengers off with the precious gold. The vessel cost nearly a quarter million dollars and was making her last trip of the season. How many there are who in the voyage of life meet similar disaster. The future is hidden from them, and when they do realize their danger, their propensities are so strong, that there is no power within them that can stay them in their career.

Afterward when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears (Heb. 12: 17).

BRIEF NOTES

In Cairo a converted Moslem, skilled in argument, preaches Christian truth three times a week to 600 Mohammedans.

The leaders of the Zionist Movement are organizing a monster demonstration throughout the world in connection with the fifth Zionist Congress.

The Salvation Army has branches in forty-nine different countries, and prints its fifty-five periodicals in twenty-one languages.

There are 120,000 enrolled Christians in Japan, of whom a third are Protestants and the rest are divided between the Greek and the Roman churches.

Dr. N. D. Hillis, of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, in fulfillment of a promise made to Dr. Gray of The Interior, preached at the funeral service on Oct. 2. Dr. Gray's instructions to him, given not long before his death, were: "Tell the brethren that I always loved principles and never hated a man. Tell them that I hope they will forget my mistakes and remember my Master."

A decree of divorce granted recently by a court in Michigan to an applicant after a year's residence, was declared worthless by a court in Toronto, when it was presented as a defence in a charge of bigamy. The case has been appealed to a higher court, and the result is anxiously awaited by many couples who have been relying on the validity of American divorces.

Rev. J. Pearse, of Madagascar, who has now seen thirty-eight years of service in that island, declares his conviction that the Malagasy Church has never been stronger or purer, or more full of promise, than it is to-day. "The Jesuits have now a very large staff in the island, but round the capital they make no perceptible headway. There is a good demand for the Bible, and it never had so many readers, or humble and sincere followers of its precepts, as at the present day."

A recent Australian mail brings news of the death of the oldest Methodist minister in the Southern Hemisphere, the Rev. Thos. Adams Bayley. He was nearly ninety years of age, and his ministerial record covered twenty-five years of service in England and forty in Australia.

The Bible Teachers' College, of Montclair, N. J., commenced its fall term on Oct. 15. A Woman's department has been organized and a suitable building leased as a home for the students. Regular instruction for the term will be given by Mr. Robert E. Speer, of New York; Dr. F. S. Schenck, of New Brunswick Theological Seminary; Dr. Robert W. Rogers, of Drew Theological Seminary and others with Dr. Wilbert W. White, Principal of the College. Mr. Speer will conduct a course of studies on the theory of the Christian Life, on Wednesday afternoons. Dr. Schenck will conduct a course of studies on Thursday afternoons on Psychology and Pedagogy. Dr. Rogers, on Friday and Saturdays, will conduct two courses, one on Psalmody and Wisdom Literature, the other on the history and prophecy of the Babylonian period. Dr. White will conduct courses in the Gospels and on Prayer. He will also give a series of book studies, and will conduct the Sunday School Normal class which meets on Friday evenings.

CHRISTIANITY AND WAR

Both Sides of a Great Question Discussed at Length

MR. H. MAXIM:—Is it consistent for a loyal Christian, who believes that war is contrary to the teachings of the Prince of Peace, to engage in the manufacture of material designed exclusively for the purpose of war?—ED. CHRISTIAN HERALD.

HUDSON MAXIM'S REPLY

THE question asked me by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a very important and a very timely one. The great majority of Christians throughout the world, while they hate war, are often called upon to themselves become warriors and to fight for their doctrines of peace. According to the annals of history, wars have almost invariably been caused by one party attempting to rob another party, or one people another people. On such occasions, it is self-evident that the blame for the wars rested with the robbers. Those who fought in defense of their lives and property, although actual participants in warfare, were guiltless.

Of course it has sometimes happened that the attempt to rob and plunder has been mutual, and that both participants were aggressors, as were Napoleon and Alexander in the Russian war. In the great majority of cases, however, one side has been on the aggressive, and the other on the defensive.

When an officer of the law catches an evil-doer in the act, and is attacked by him, if in making an arrest the officer is compelled to draw his own revolver and shoot the malefactor, he does a justifiable act. We have here war in miniature, and it may be taken as a type of all wars. While we are free to grant that wars are wrong, yet the wrong rests entirely with the offenders instead of the defenders of human rights.

Housebreaking is wrong, yet the brave knight who, in mediæval times breached a castle wall to free some prisoner unjustly held, did a wholly commendable act. Similarly, one nation which has raised an army to free from bondage slaves held by another nation, has done an equally commendable act, and the blame for the war rests with those who held the slaves.

War is an ugly and an awful thing, while some peace theories are very beautiful, and they are quite safe in times of peace; but when slaves have to be freed, then, as in our great Civil War, the true Christians take down their old swords and shoulder their old guns and go to the front. If we read the inscriptions on the monuments erected to the memory of those who died in that awful struggle, we find it was an army of Christians who fell.

War is often a necessity. It cannot always be avoided, and when it comes we want the best tools we can get with which to fight. It is criminal negligence for a nation not to be prepared for war. It is criminal negligence for a great nation not to be abreast of the times in arms and equipments.

Improved guns and ammunition, improved destructive agencies for offense and defense, are but means of saving life. Modern armies and navies are but elaborate life-saving systems, as humanitarian in character as the life-saving services along the coasts of civilized countries, whose duty it is to warn vessels of danger and to succor those who may be cast away. The fort is as humanitarian in its nature as the lighthouse, and the seacoast rifle is as much an implement of mercy as the gun that throws the life-line to a stranded wreck.

Civilization and Christianity go hand in hand. Whatever helps to spread civilization also helps to spread the teachings of Christ. Therefore, whatever helps civilization must help Christianity. We now have a starting point and a foundation on which to base our reasoning.

If we shall be able to show that gunpowder and civilization go hand in hand, the same as do Christianity and civilization, and that improvements in implements of war and in every branch of the art and science of fighting have tended and are constantly tending to spread Christian enlightenment over the earth, then we shall have proven our case. Christian civilization, steam and gunpowder are the great Triumvirs, who have been the architects of the modern world.

The debt which civilization owes to gunpowder is one of the greatest that history has to record. In every land, and upon every sea, gunpowder stands guardian over all the accumulated wealth and progress of the nations.

The earth-jarring thunder of the seacoast gun—the hum of the great steel bolt as it speeds along its way—the crash into the steel ribs of the battleship—are all voices that speak of the highest development in the arts and sciences of an iron age where chemistry is king.

The fighting instinct has, perhaps, been the ruling trait of our race from remote antiquity where fact blends with fable. The sun of civilization's dawn broke through a war cloud, and what light it has since shed on mankind has been through rifts in clouds of war. The fighting instinct has made ours the dominating race. It is the fighting instinct in business that has cleared the land of forests, planted industries and civilization over vast continents, and united them with ties of trade, reducing the ocean to a ferry.

Often at the bayonet's point, trade and civilization, and even Christianity, have been forced upon the savage, and upon exclusive and unwarlike peoples, and now Christianity, civilization and militarism, sisters of strange relation, hand in hand embrace the world.

In direct proportion as the wealth of a nation is increased, its powers of offense and defense should be increased. In direct proportion as a nation becomes a world power in commerce, so must its naval and military strength become world-wide and world-powerful. International interests are largely founded on the security guaranteed by naval and military prowess.

In Sartor Resartus Carlyle says:

The first ground handful of nitre, sulphur and charcoal drove Monk Schwartz's pestle through the ceiling. What will the last do?

His own answer is that it will "achieve the final undisputed prostration of force under thought, of animal courage under spiritual."

Again Carlyle says in the same work:

Such I hold to be the genuine use of gunpowder: that it makes all men alike tall. Nay, if thou be cooler, cleverer than I, if thou have more mind, though all but no body whatever, then canst thou kill me first, and art the taller. Hereby, at last is the Goliath powerless and the David resistless; savage animalism is nothing, inventive spiritualism is all.

It was George Washington who said that the best way to preserve peace is to be prepared for war. There never was a better Christian or a greater warrior than George Washington.

What does the Bible say about Christ's mission of peace? Let us quote:

And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men (Luke 2: 13, 14).

And thou, child, shall be called the Prophet of the Highest ... To guide our feet into the way of peace (Luke 1: 76, 79).

And his name shall be called . . . The Prince of Peace (Is. 9: 6).

I hold that there is nothing whatever in the foregoing quotations inconsistent with warring for the right. From the nature of things, war is often the price of peace, and justice can only be enforced by the sword. In the great American Rebellion it was the voice of guns alone which could command the emancipation of the slaves.

An apostle of the Prince of Peace may often best serve his Master by becoming a good soldier. The Christians armies that turned back and drove out of Europe the invading Moors rendered their Master better service than had they, in order to escape war, fled before advancing Turks.

Should China become really aroused and advance during the next twenty-five years as rapidly as have Japan during a like period in the past, and should the great "Yellow Peril" rise in its might and threaten the Christian world, is there a single soldier of the Christian world now enlisted in the cause of Peace who would not buckle on his cartridge belt, shoulder his gun and fight in the defense of his religion and his home?

Let us again quote from the Scriptures:

The Lord is a man of war (Ex. 15: 3).

The Lord of Hosts is his name (Is. 51: 15).

Blessed be the Lord, my strength, which teacheth my hands to war and my fingers to fight (Ps. 144: 1).

It is evident that there must have been a misunderstanding of His true mission by Christ's followers, for he said: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword" (Matt. 10: 34).

I am come to send fire on the earth (Luke 12: 49).

For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But thou dost that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth no sword in vain; for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil (Rom. 13: 4).

There can be but one interpretation of Christianity, and but one interpretation of true peace. Without justice, the mere absence of war does not constitute peace to the Christian. Neither to the Christian is war waged in the interest of justice incompatible with peace principles which underlie his religious faith. Therefore, the true interpretation of peace is absence of war, where justice reigns, and the true Christian mission is to see that justice be done, for without it there can be no righteous peace. Such peace as can reign without justice becomes the abettor of injustice.

Intellectual acuteness is always much in measure a necessity. The peoples of the northern nations who had to contend with the winter's cold, and who had to war with the wolf of hunger through the long months of frost, are far superior intellectually to the inhabitants of tropic climes. Necessity is the mother of invention. With the increase of necessity, the alertness and sagacity of the individual, who must meet changed conditions, must also be increased, or he will perish. Such has been the history of the race. It is obvious that nothing could so stimulate intellectual acuteness as war, calling for the

SHOULD CHRISTIANS MAKE OR SELL FIRE-ARMS?

BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE

WAR a necessity. Accident and disease and plague do not carry off the people fast enough, and wars must remove the surplus population of the earth. Suppose that the hundreds of millions of people who in the centuries past were ejected by war, had been permitted to live on to old age, what a crowded and cluttered up world this would have been. Beside that the scroll of heroes would never have been made up, and Caesar and Alexander and Miltiades and Wellington and Washington might never have been heard of. Instead of deploring war, we ought to hail it with gladness and thanksgiving. Such heathenism and brutal theories as these have sometimes been publicly, but oftener in private, announced. So far from adopting such ideas we believe war to be the worst curse that ever smote the nations. It is wholesale murder. It is national and international assassination.

If this be so, then ought Christian men have anything to do with the manufacture or sale of instruments of death? That question has recently been asked in most startling manner. My answer is that the nation which would stop the making of fire-arms, and cease the building of fortresses, and the launching of battleships would commit suicide. The best way to keep peace is to be fully prepared for war. How long, suppose you, foreign nations would keep their hands off if they had not heard something of our navy at Manila and our army at Santiago, and of the Northern and Southern forces of our Civil War, now all united under one flag and ready, shoulder to shoulder, to meet the whole earth in battle array? Not for oppressive, but for defensive war, we must be ready until all the civilized rulers of the earth shall solemnly swear before high Heaven that under no circumstances will they attempt bloodshed, but will leave all to a jury made up of the leading men of all nations. Even then, all the republics and empires of the earth ought to keep enough military equipment, not only to put down disorder at home, but to put down by military force any nation that would break its pledge of substitution of treaty for murder.

My opinion is that the last wars of the world are now being fought. I expect to see the last cannon spiked, and instead of the vulture it will be the dove. But until that time comes, I hail with gladness the report of new and better American battle-ships, and guns of longer range, and fortresses better manned. The manufacturers who turn out cannon and sabres and howitzers and artillery, and armor for ships, are engaged in a lawful and righteous business, and if I were a mechanic I would as conscientiously make a sword as a carving knife, a rifle as a spade. We must take things as they are, not as we would like to have them. Meanwhile, let it be known that most of that which is now called from Berlin and London about the Czar, Nicholas the Second, as a disturber of nations and of himself in personal peril, is syndicated defamation. Those two satellites at Berlin and London never allow more than ten days to pass without misrepresenting something concerning Russia and its ruler. All that talk about the emperor encased in armor, and daring not to move out, and in hysterics of fear, is fabrication. The czar is as happy a ruler as the world holds to-day. He is in no more peril than any man or woman who reads these lines. There were no armed men anywhere about when we visited the Czar last summer. We saw no ride through the streets of St. Petersburg unattended. "But," says some one, "do they not assassinate rulers in Russia?" Not so much as in the United States. They assassinated Alexander the Second, but for all one outrage our country has seen three rulers slain—Abraham Lincoln, James A. Garfield and William McKinley. There is not so much nihilism in St. Petersburg as in Chicago and New York. Nicholas the Second will live to see the principles of his Convention at the Hague carried out, and to see some of the thrones of Europe, which, because of jealousy, now mock at him, rocked down, never again to rise.

The Hearing Ear

LOOKING over some large congregations, I have lately been wondering how many among them have what may be called the hearing ear. One hears a very earnest sermon, and sees on many faces a trace of what appears to be earnest thought. Coming out of church the conversation is thoughtful, is composed of idle words, and ranges over the endless everyday topics; there are familiar greetings, laughing exchanges of gossip, and besides the invariable letting down which follows intense excitement, there is often a reaction which takes away the effect of the good seed. It was not sown on stony ground. It sprang up on good soil, but superficially, where there was no depth of heart. More than we are ready to concede does the responsibility about preaching lie with the one who hears. Have we trained ourselves in the matter of listening? Do we give our whole attention to the speaker? Are we deeply enamored of the truth, so that we long to know it, in its depth, and breadth, and full sweetness? Are we convinced that we do not attend church for entertainment, but for instruction? The office of the pulpit is to teach; the privilege of the pew is to be taught. Do we acknowledge this?

There are times when people lose the benefit of an excellent discourse, because the preacher has eccentric mannerisms, harsh voice, or grotesque gestures. His garb may be rough, and yet he eloquently tell of righteousness, of pardon, of Christ's love, of the Holy Spirit, and of a future judgment. John the Baptist was a man of rough exterior, who came from the depth of the desert to awaken a slumbering nation. "Behold, our Lord said, that there had never been born of woman a greater man than John the Baptist."

We, who have attended the sanctuary for long years of precious Sabbaths, ought to have garnered up a harvest of wealth for the quiet hours of the evening. Whenever we hear a sermon, we ought to read by ourselves over again the portion of Scripture which contains the text, and the hymns which we sing should be again conned in the twilight. Not long ago, a family who had been much profited in the morning service, sat together in the gloaming, and recited every verse they could think of, which began on the minister's text, and then sang in the eventide the sweet hymns which choir and people had lifted up in praise, in the earlier day. Thus the service was continued and the sweet influence prolonged till the shadows fell.

In old-fashioned custom, now too often obsolete in the life, was that of talking over a sermon in the household, and requiring from the children the text at the heads of the discourse. This insured attentive listening on the part of the younger people, and, besides its spiritual effect, was a valuable mental discipline. Our Sundays should deepen our spiritual life, and lead us to greater purity in the day by day routine. As we gather in God's house, there should go from heart to heart an impulse to more entire consecration; a fervor and kindling from the Holy Ghost should fan the embers, and increase our devotion, and cause our hearts to burn more brightly.

"Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly Dove,
With all Thy quickening powers,
Kindle a flame of sacred love
In these cold hearts of ours."

A Sabbath well spent, brings a week of content.
We are preparing for the beautiful home above, where We go no more out forever.

"Where congregations ne'er break up And Sabbaths never end."

Food and Raiment

We are not promised superfluities nor luxuries, but, if we are the children of God, we are told that we shall have whatever is needful on the journey of life. Food enough for each day, raiment to keep us warm and protect us from the weather, and a shelter from our enemies, if we have any, and from the elements. We worry now and then, because we do not see the road before us, because crops are poor, and money is scarce, and times are hard. But all the while our Father knows what we need before we ask him, and our food and clothing are secure. Sometimes, when we fully trust him, he feeds us on the finest of the wheat, and the garb we wear, washed white in the atoning blood, is fit robing for the children of the King.

GIRLISH CONFIDENCE

BONNIE'S PRAYER

DEAR little Bonnie, four years old,
Thoughtful as child of her age could be,
Said her prayers, as her mother told,
Nightly, kneeling beside her knee.

But she said one night, this quaint little elf,
"I've a wish my mamma, so good and true,
Let me kneel by the bedside all by myself
And make my prayers as the big folks do."

So all were quiet as mice could be,
While Bonnie, robed in her night-gown white,
Stole on tiptoe and bent her knee
All alone for her prayers that night.

Only a moment the wee head bowed,
Then the face came up with a smile most fair,
And the other children laughed aloud
At the wondrous shortness of Bonnie's prayer.

There came a little flush of dismay
Over the radiant face so small,
"I couldn't think of much to say,
So I said, 'Lord, keep me,' and that was all."

Papa kissed her and gravely smiled,
"That was the best of prayers, my dear;
It was all you needed to say, my child,
You could ask no more if you prayed a year."

From "Life and Song," Poems by Anna R. Henderson.

Mr. McKinley's Will

IN Mr. McKinley's will, made some years ago, there was a touching revelation of his devotion to Mrs. McKinley, the greater that when he made the will, there was no probability that he would be the one to go first. "My chief concern is that my wife shall have enough to live in great comfort." "I wish everything arranged for the comfort and pleasure of my wife," the phrases recur. "I desire that my mother shall have everything to make her old age comfortable and happy."

The dear old mother was in heaven to welcome her son when he reached the shining shore. The idolized wife survives, and there will be no stint of comfort for her as long as she lives. And a whole nation is proud of the husband whose forethought was so lovingly expressed.

A great deal of trouble would often be saved, if everyone who has even a little to leave, would make a will, and put it into legal shape.

Miriam's First Love Affair

It seemed to the dear grandmother, that only yesterday Miriam had been a wee lassie learning the alphabet, yet, here she was kneeling by her lap and telling her that she had accepted John Gordon, and meant in a year or so to be married. "And you are not yet twenty?" said grandmother, smiling. "Yes, dear," replied the girl, "but please remember how old you were, or how young, when you were married to grandfather." "We grew up sooner in the old days," said the lady musingly. "I was not seventeen when I stood up with Hugh, before the minister. I never had my hair put up in grown people's fashion till my bridal morning. Well, well, and now my little Miriam has heard the same, old sweet story, and her woman's life is beginning in earnest!"

Miriam's parents were dead, and her home had always been with her grandmother, a very happy and sheltered home. No rude blasts of fate or touch of unkindness had ever come near the child. John Gordon was a neighbor's son, a man to be trusted and honored, and it was a relief to the grandmother, that her affections had been won, not by a stranger, but by a man she knew all about.

The tie between the two women, the young and the old, was very strong. They understood one another, and there was no danger of alienation, nor would they drift apart, when Miriam had other interests. She would always tenderly cherish and lovingly esteem the guardian of her childhood.

The Door of the Lips

Let six people who have been present at a scene describe it, and though all may be truthful, impressions will differ, so that there will be some discrepancies in statement. In speaking about friends or foes, we should set a watch upon our lips, and, if we can, narrate facts, not mere impressions.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. These questions are printed Four weeks in advance so as to afford all our readers an opportunity to answer them.

II. For answers to the questions which appear below, when a reader will allow compensation for the matter used, the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append their name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Nov. 27

1. Is it not equally murder in the sight of God for a man to kill another in war or in private life?
2. Are some children naturally born more bright than others? Is there such a quality as inherited or inborn genius, or is it merely the result of culture, environment and a right direction of individual tastes and predilections?
3. Where the author of a historical novel introduces in his book Bible characters and events, does it tend to increase or decrease reverence for the sacred Word?
4. Where can rich people do the greater amount of good to mankind: in founding libraries, where books and newspapers are cheap and abundant; or in building comfortable cottages, in the place of the miserable tenements, which nurture ignorance and crime in the cities?
5. May we expect that the world will be converted before the second coming of Christ?

Questions of the Week

1. Who was the mother of Mary, the mother of Jesus, and where is the information to be found?

The childhood of Mary is wholly legendary. Joachim and Anna, supposedly the parents, were both of the race of David, the former living in Nazareth and the latter in Bethlehem. In the legend they pass through similar experiences to those of Zacharias and Elizabeth, and Hannah. Their daughter Mary was dedicated to the Lord at the Temple where she remained from her third year until she was fourteen, and then unwittingly betrothed to her cousin Joseph. Eusebius, an early ecclesiastical historian, respects Anne as the mother of Mary. The genealogy of the father of Mary (or Mariam in the Hebrew), is recorded by Luke in the third chapter; the twenty-third verse reads, "... Joseph, which was the son of Heli, which was the son of Mattathias." ... the "son" by good authorities, is translated "son-in-law!" Heli was, therefore, Mary's father. Matthew gives Joseph's father as Jacob, son of Matthan, which is another spelling for the name Matthat, so Mary's Heli, and Joseph's father Jacob were brothers. A number of writings professing to supplement the New Testament were known in the early ages of the Church, but are excluded as forgeries, from the canon, and arranged as a New Testament Apocrypha. In it are a "Gospel of Mary" in ten chapters, and a "History of Joseph," these have the legendary accounts of Joachim and Anna.

H. F. BROCKETT.

The mother of Mary, the mother of Jesus, was Anne, or Anna (as in the Greek), and her father Joachim. The information is not found in the New Testament, but is given in a book of early date, called Protevangelion Jacobi, that is, "The Gospel according to James," a work never received into the Canon of Scripture. Although in the Roman Catholic Church the whole literature of legends was condemned by the decrees of Gelasius, yet many of its details—such as the name of the Virgin Mary's mother—crept into the traditions of the church, and are believed by many.

2. What is the duty of "Shut-ins" toward the Church, and how can that duty be best performed? Also, what is the duty of Church and pastor toward the "Shut-in?"

The work done by and for the "Shut-ins" may be made one of the most delightful features of church life. Those who are unfortunately shut into the narrow walls of home or boarding-place should never have cause to feel neglected or forgotten by the Church. Neither should the "Shut-ins" allow themselves to be shut out from the love and sympathy of their spiritual brothers and sisters. They should occasionally send messages expressive of prayerful and loving interest in the welfare of the Church—to be read at some prayer meeting. If able, they should be regular contributors to the church treasury. The conditions being favorable, some might aid the Sewing Society in making fancy articles for sale, or in sewing for the needy. Others might write letters to other "Shut-ins," and in thus trying to cheer their fellow-sufferers, cheer themselves. The "Shut-ins" should see the pastor in their homes as often as consistent with his other duties, and in the course of a year, should also meet a large number of the Church members. A prayer meeting or a quiet social might be held now and then with a "Shut-in." Books, flowers, fruit, cooked dainties, warm and comfortable clothing should be supplied according to the needs and tastes of the recipients. The Church Calendar should be sent to each "Shut-in" every week. A bright, cheery letter should now and then be sent to those who cannot see callers. In short, Church members should do to the "Shut-ins" as they would be done by, if they themselves were "Shut-ins."

MRS. LUCY T. WILSON

The Christian whom "God hath shut in" cannot be "shut out" from his holy work. The many quiet hours—fraught with the father and mother. But to do a miracle he must be above the plane upon which he could have human ties. Not as her son, but as her Lord he could do a miracle. In the question he asks, "What community exists between you and me in the exercise of a divine function?" The appeal to the mother of Christ was, if not refuted there, a dishonoring of the real divinity which he possessed. The appeal to the "mother" now, dishonors the Divine Son, and makes of his Messianic power a trifling thing.

C. P. A.

The language of Christ on this occasion appears somewhat mysterious and cannot be fully explained. The epithet "Woman," however abrupt it may sound to English ears, in Greek signifies respect, and was used by men in addressing females of highest rank. The expression "What have I to do with thee?" (In plainer form "What hast thou to do with me?") though it may imply a gentle reproach, may only be designed to intimate that whatever filial duty Jesus might owe to his mother, gave her no right to interfere with his public duties. He was "about his Father's business," and knew when and how to act, without any human direction. His "hour" was not yet come, and he probably had reasons for delay, unknown to her, and it is evident she did not understand this as a refusal, because she directed the servants to obey his orders.

4. In the case of a strike, such as that of mortuaries on the cars, would a Christian working man who is unemployed, be justified in offering to take the place of a striker? A strike may be either just or unjust. If purifying fire of pain—may be spent in Divine companionship, learning from the great Architect the more perfect plan of building the soul's temple and storing it with the sunshine of peace or resignation. With the spiritual life thus strengthened, the "Shut-in" holds a sceptre of helpfulness that is felt throughout the church, and keeps him in loving touch with all departments of church work. "The Church can help the 'Shut-in' by letting him feel that he is always counted as one of the spiritual family, though compelled to be 'absent in the body' from public worship. When holding meetings of special interest, such as conventions, rallies, C. E. Union work, etc., make the "Shut-in" a part of the meetings by sending flowers with badge of society and programme of work. Never allow Easter or Thanksgiving to pass by without a greeting to your invalid. I have seen this plan tried, and it proved a means of growth in Christian fellowship.

3. In what sense are we to understand Christ's word to his mother (John 2: 4): "Woman, what have I to do with thee?"

According to Dr. Edersheim, in his Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, Christ was repudiating the idea that seemed about to be seemingly confirmed, that his divine power was to be subject to his human relationship to his mother. In the exercise of all the functions of the human child he was absolutely filial. "He was subject to them"—his the strike be a just one, for the redressing of a real grievance, or the resisting of actual oppression, let the Christian worker stand aloof. He would not be justified in committing the meanness of working against his fellow-man. If, however, the strike be arbitrary and uncalled for, as many are, he may accept employment with a clear conscience. It is well in any event to be fully informed as to the facts before acting.

JOHN DAYTON.

No man with a strong sense of justice would voluntarily strengthen the cause of the oppressor and weaken the cause of the oppressed by taking the place of a striker, when the cause of the strike is a just one and his situation one of crying necessity. In one sense, however, in this free country with its free institutions, every one is at liberty to and has the moral right to engage with an employer on harsher terms than his fellows, in order to secure a job, and it is an evident indication that he needs work most who is willing to receive less pay. When any considerable number of men are willing and anxious to engage work on terms against which others have struck, it does not seem that the strike is either a wise or a justifiable one. Some strikes ought never to succeed; others should call forth a willing sacrifice from every one for the cause of justice and humanity. Certainly, the Christian would be the last one to seek to profit at the cost of the welfare of his fellows. The justice of the strikers' cause is the pivotal point in the question.

WALTER W. HUBBARD.

5. In the management of church affairs, should the man who contributes little or nothing to the support of the church have as much power as he who contributes liberally, presuming that both are members in good standing?

Assuming the two to be equally able to give, the more liberal should have the more power, whether that word be understood relating to official, i.e., delegated, prominence or to the personal, subjective influence which is the result of inherent excellence of character. Spontaneous liberality in giving is one of the best of all criteria of a genuinely noble, because loving nature, hence the possessor of such a disposition is morally certain to acquire a greater ascendancy over the hearts of his fellows, than the man of niggardly instincts, whether that eminence be aided by official promotion or otherwise. On the other hand, liberal giving, per se, should not be the test of the esteem in which a church member is to be held. The measure of ability is the Master's test, and each one must discharge his duty in the line of giving, by the light of that test, for himself alone.

ARTHUR H. BIGG

Position and power in the church must be dependent on contributions to the support of the church. The bane of the church has been that she has catered to men of wealth or position in giving them places in the church for which they are by no means fitted. And the church is reaping the bitter fruit of that godless policy in the worldliness in which she has fallen. It is spiritual character, combined with executive ability, that alone ought to be recognized in the conduct of the church's affairs.

JOSEPH HAMILTON

There can be no fixed rule in such matters. Ordinarily, those who contribute liberally, they are active members, are entitled to consideration in all questions relating to the church's welfare, as their liberality argues well for their spiritual interest. Again, it may be an easy matter for them to give generously, compared with others who, though poorer, may be far more valuable counselors. I have known one instance where a large part of the spiritual life of a church revolved around a single member of the congregation, comparatively poor in means, yet rich in grace and wholly consecrated to the Lord's work. His example energized and inspired others and influenced the whole church. The real power in a church is the zealous practical Christian who, consumed with "passion for souls," is recognized as a leader by all who are laboring for the spiritual welfare of the flock.

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some one asked last year (Sept. 5, 1900) how a person could be built up when the whole system was weak and poor. A doctor answered that drinking the "strippings" of cow's milk warm would build the system. I tried it, and in half a year I gained thirty-six pounds, and am now strong. Nothing has helped me like this, and I am very thankful. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the doctor were the advice.

BYRON SUNDERLAND

A TRIBUTE TO A FAITHFUL SERVANT of CHRIST

By REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE

AMONG the recent departures from this world, the going of the Pastor Emeritus, of the First Presbyterian Church, of Washington City, has caused great sorrow, and called forth much eulogium. A more completely rounded life than that of Dr. Sunderland we know not. From early manhood, in the twenties, to old age, in the eighties, he was always ber of sorrows he soothed, the perplexities he scattered, the kind words he spake, the sermons he preached, the souls that through his instrumentality were saved. Dr. Sunderland was one of the few men who could use wit and humor and sarcasm in a Christian way. Those who have been seated with him at family table know his talent for repartee, his wealth in vocabulary of amusement. While never touching anything like frivolity in the pulpit, his way of holding up to scorn something reprehensible would put upon his audience the broad smile. In that he imitated Elijah, who advised the Baalites to pray louder, so as to wake up their god, who might be taking an afternoon nap; and also imitated Christ, who sarcastically complimented the corrupt Pharisees by saying, "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." So many of Doctor Sunderland's sermons gleamed here and there with sudden brightness. There was nothing sombre in his character. His religion seemed to agree with him.

The dear old church where he preached so long is filled from pulpit to front door and from floor to ceiling with his memories. Officiating at weddings, he was especially effective, and sweeter than the orange blossoms were the words he would utter, and after the vows were pledged and the twain moved out the aisle, all thought that if the happiness of the young couple were ever wrecked on the sea of life, it would not be from any lack of auspicious launching. But the volume of his life is closed. Goodbye, old friend, till we meet where there is no parting!

What a shout of welcome must have greeted him at the gate of heaven when he ascended. Tens of thousands of souls whom he had in some way blest, I think were ready to hail him. Some ministering spirit between earth and heaven may have announced in glory that the soul of our friend was about to enter, and it did not take a moment to assemble a great multitude to be present at the arrival. What celebration and reunion, and reminiscence and doxology!

BRAVERY

TO toil and strive for those she loves,
To stand beside a grave and weep,
To see the earth hide what is dear,
And wish she, too, could go to sleep.
To work for those who need her care,
For still life brings its stern demands,
No time to soothe her aching brow,
No rest for tired brain and hands.
To bravely labor on and wait,
To count the slender fare each night,
To see sweet trusting lives depend
On her to make their burdens light.
To meet each duty with a smile,
To live and to herself be true,
To scatter sunshine by the way,
And bless God for his mercies too.
Brave heart, thy Father claims for thee,
A starry-crowned eternity.

A DROP of ink will color a whole glass of water. It is an inch of yeast which makes a pan of bread rise, and a single cake of soap containing unabsorbed alkali can ruin a hundred times its cost in laces and fine embroidery. After all, is it wise to take such risks with common soap? Of course you can get along without Ivory Soap. So can a wagon without axle grease—but it goes hard.

Dr. Sunderland used often to mirthfully tell how President Lincoln made allusion to his physical size, when the doctor at the White House confronted the President for the purpose of advising some movement in the time of the Civil War, and the President, looking at the doctor from head to foot, said, "Well, every little helps."

But what a great soul he was! Consecrated, patriotic, poetic, logical, effective in pulpit and on platform. Fearless, he could wield a battle-axe. Against the evils of his day he gave many a stout blow. At times he was a warrior of the type of Joshua, but the sun and moon did not have to stand still to allow him to complete his victories. He was a man of peace, but when war was on, he worshiped the Lord of hosts. If you were in the wrong and traitorous to your country, you might as well meet a lion robbed of her whelps as to meet him. But ordinarily he lamb-like in his nature was more evasive than the lion-like. Children loved him, and the sick liked to have him come into their room, so soft was his step, so kind his voice, so sympathetic his look, so comforting his prayer.

If sometimes he was what the Bible calls "a son of thunder," he was oftener "a son of consolation." No statistics could ever be tabulated telling the num-

WHEN TWO MET

By MARY C. FRANCIS

THERE was the usual night revelry in one of the most disreputable saloons at the lower end of the Bowery. It was Saturday evening, and the week's earnings were being freely spent in that nauseous, tainted atmosphere, where, at times, the smoke from ill-scented cigars made a blue haze that half-veiled the stage, with its shabby belongings, whereon at intervals appeared "artists" of more or less doubtful talent and repute. The piano was being banged by a man who looked like a butcher's assistant, and a very blonde young woman was diligently at work on a song relating to the pleasure of visiting the old farm. There was a rather mixed gathering, the usual habitues, some verdant sightseers from the country, an imprudent Westerner with a roll which he injudiciously displayed, a newspaper man escorting a party of his friends who wanted to "see Bohemia," a candidate for the Legislature, who had dropped in merely to assure his friends that he would not forget them at Albany, and a party of four who made a distinct element by themselves, two men in evening dress, and two women, chic and well-groomed, richly but quietly gowned in black and wearing heavy veils. These latter sat as far apart from the company as possible, and surveyed the scene with that deep interest of the Four Hundred when it sees the under-world.

The blonde young woman had considerably ended her vocal selection and had been replaced by two specialty artists who were now doing astonishing things with balls and hoops. The politician was for the twentieth time assuring his constituency that it would be his pride to see to it that laws were made for the rich as well as for the poor, and the Westerner was trying to decide whether the change the waiter had brought him represented what was left of a $10 or a $20 bill, when a young man entered. He bore the evident signs of an inexperienced and verdant youth, and looked about him with the air of one who sees such sights for the first time. He sat down at a table occupied by three sailors and tried hard to appear at ease.

"That," proceeded the newspaper man, continuing his exposition for the benefit of his party, "is a young fellow who has never been in such a resort before. If we stay here a while longer we may see something happen to him; he has not one chance in ten of getting out of here without a new experience."

"Well, something may happen to him, but I think he looks as if he could make things happen to others if he were to start out," said one of the girls of the party, "See his broad shoulders and his strong hands, he is used to farm work and has the strength of a young ox."

"Yes, very true, it might come out one way or another, but you must remember the odds would be against him here. Look over at that table in the corner. See that girl with the dark, curly hair? She is Fighting Kate. She's not a half bad sort when she isn't drunk, but she usually is, and she's pretty far gone just now. She's as brave as a lion, though, saved a baby in a fire a week ago. We published her picture, and she was so proud she had three fights the next day, but she was too popular to be arrested. 'Howdy, Kate?' He spoke familiarly to the girl as she passed the table on her way out. 'Going home early, ain't you?'

"Yes; I'm afraid I'll be late to Sunday School in the morning if I don't," she replied.

"Oh, come now, Kate, you don't expect us to believe that you ever were inside a Sunday School, do you?"

"Wasn't I! Why, I went a whole year reg'lar when I was only nine years old and got a Bible for it, and I learned the Shorter Catechism by heart. Likely you can't say as much yourself."

"You're right, Kate; but somehow I never connected you with church work. It don't seem quite like your forte. Now, my friends here are all active church workers"—a horrified exclamation came from the women, but Kinsley went on calmly—"and I'll wager that there are others in this room at this moment who are no strangers to the sanctuary; they're like us, merely looking around a little in a quiet way. Are you feeling pretty good, Kate?"

"Never felt better in my life."

"Then do something to prove your early religious training right now."

The girl threw back her head and looked about the room; then she burst into a laugh.

"Why, there's them here that ud look well passing the contribution plate," she said. "Look at that rich old man over there with the wad. He's a deacon or something, and that swell lot over there belong to St. Paul's or Trinity very likely, and that innocent young guy there with his first glass of beer. He's never been away from home before. Oh, what a joke! I'll go you! Listen!"

She whirled, planted one hand on her side and without warning broke forth into the hymn, "In the Sweet Bye and Bye." Her voice, a full, not unmusical soprano, was strong and clear. She missed never a word or a note, but sang the entire song through to the end amid such an astonished silence as had never before fallen upon that place. Every eye turned in amazement upon her, every ear drinking in the melody of that hymn that has brought tears to the eyes of thousands. Ere the first stanza was ended not a glass clinked, not a voice sounded. The raucous piano had stilled its brazen banging; the artists on the stage stood dumbfounded; the proprietor, who at first had started forward, was stayed by a sign from the politician; the waiters stood with unnoticed glasses. Everything came to an absolute standstill while Fighting Kate rolled out the stanzas of the song. When it was ended, "Bravo!" cried a voice, and "Bravo!" cried another. There was a tremendous clapping of hands, a stamping of feet and boisterous cheering. Kate paid not the slightest attention to their applause, but swung off into: "Bringing in the Sheaves." The half martial suggestion of the music appealed to many; there was a subdued tapping of feet on the floor. At the chorus the piano took up the accompaniment and more than one masculine voice burred a wordless refrain. By the time this song was concluded nearly every one in the place, fallen under the strange spell, was humming or singing with the girl. The Western man looked slightly dazed; the politician nodded his head approvingly.

But the three sailors, deeply intoxicated, did not approve. One turned to the young fellow, whose eyes were fixed on the girl with a deep stare, and said: "Think you've got into a revival by mistake, eh, don't you? Bowery prayer-meeting reg'lar on Saturday night."

A SCIENTIFIC BREAKFAST

Rightly selected food will relieve more than half the diseases. Try a scientific and health breakfast:—Fruit of some kind, preferably cooked; a dish of Grape-Nuts with cream; two soft-boiled eggs. Put two eggs in a tin pin cup of boiling water, cover, and set off for nine minutes. Whites will then be the consistency of cream, and most easily digested. One slice of bread with butter; cup of Postum Cereal Food Coffee.

On that breakfast you can work like a horse and be perfectly nourished until noon. You nervous troubles, heart palpitation, stomach and bowel troubles, kidney complaints and various other disorders will gradually disappear and firm solid health will set in.

Why? You have probably been living on poorly-selected food, that is food that does not contain the required elements the body needs. That sort of food, and coffee, is the direct or indirect cause of more than half the ills the human body acquires.

Grape Nuts is a perfectly cooked food and both that and the Postum Food Coffee contain fine microscopic particles of phosphorus of potash obtained in a natural way from the grains of the field and by scientific food experts incorporated into food and drink. The element joins with the albumen in food to make gray matter, which is the filling of the brain cells and the nerve centers all over the human body.

A man or woman thus fed is scientifically fed and rapidly grows in vigor and vitality and becomes capable of conducting successfully the affairs of life. To produce a perfect body and a money making brain, the body must have the right kind of food and the expert food specialist knows how to make it. That is Grape Nuts and Postum Cereal Food Coffee, produced at the pure food factory of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Batt Creek, Mich.

COFFEE DID IT.

Would have been Fatal if Kept Up.

"Coffee!! Oh, how I did want it after the nervous strain of public work. Something warm to brace me up was all the breakfast I craved, but every time I drank it, I suffered the dying sensation that follows it with heart fluttering and throbbing of the throat and ears."

I had no strength to throw away in that way, so decided that hot water must do for me."

One morning I came to breakfast in the home of some friends in Pueblo, Colo., just in time to see the Mother pouring some rich yellow coffee into mugs for the two little boys. One little chap had thrust his fingers in the mug and was licking them with such approving smacks. This opened the way for me to say, "Are you not afraid of the effects of coffee on the little folks?" The mother explained that it was Postum Food Coffee made at Battle Creek, Michigan, and remarked, "We think there is nothing like it." When she explained how the new coffee had crept them away from the use of the old-fashioned coffee and tea because "it is so wholesome," I drank it there for the first time, and was delighted, not only with the delicious flavor, but the after satisfaction it gives. One day I was speaking with our family physician's wife about Postum, when her daughter remarked, "Yes, Mamma, we are out of Postum, and I have used coffee for the last two mornings and it always brings the tired feeling and troubles my stomach and bowels, but Postum makes me feel all right."

In one home they served Postum in such a way that it was tasteless. I have found that Postum boiled sometimes five minutes, and sometimes ten, is nothing more than spoiled water, but when it is made with two heaping spoonfuls for each cup, and boiled fifteen or twenty minutes it becomes a tried and proven breakfast favorite, and for refreshment and wholesome nourishment, has no equal." WHEN TWO MET

The young fellow flushed hotly and hurled an unexpected reply at his companion: "Well, it's not the first time I've been at a prayer-meeting." The sailor laughed roughly. "Hear that, Jim? He's a returned missionary, and Fighting Kate's his pal. She's—" The young man jumped up and squared himself threateningly.

"Not a word about the girl," he cried. "Don't get gay," growled the sailor, "she's no better than she ought to be. You'd make a fine pair, I don't think."

The young fellow's right arm shot out; the sailor went down. The two others fell upon him; Kate rushed up. Within less than five minutes a typical Bowery fight had taken place. The police rushed in; the swell party fled with precipitant haste, and Kate, the three sailors and the young man were marched off under arrest, while a trail of broken glass and several blood-stained faces told of the reality of an episode in "East-side low life."

On Monday morning five very sober and very disheveled prisoners appeared in the police court to answer a charge of drunk and disorderly. The officer told the tale, and, though the young man, who gave his name as Tom Smith, asserted that he was not at all intoxicated on the night in question, the magistrate shook his head and read him a lecture, winding up by fining all parties concerned three dollars apiece. The three sailors could not pay, and were remanded; but the young fellow paid the fine of himself and Fighting Kate, and they were discharged, with the advice of the magistrate not to be found in the docket again.

They walked out of the musty courtroom together.

"Where are you going?" asked Smith of the girl.

"Nowhere," she sullenly. "Well, let's go somewhere and talk it over," he said, good-naturedly, "and then I'll go home. My folks knew I'd come to New York for a little visit, but they'll never know how I spent the time, and it's a good thing they won't."

They went into a cheap restaurant and sat at a table, and he ordered the best lunch the place afforded. Country bred, his stomach had revolted at the fare offered while he looked up, and he ate voraciously at first, while his companion, more accustomed to dissipation, partook more lightly. After a while they talked.

"You're awful afraid of your folks finding out where you've been and what you've been doing, ain't you?" she asked, with a half sneer.

He flushed: "Well, yes, to tell the truth I am, or rather I should say that I'm glad they'll never find out. What I have said refers to what my feelings would be if they did find out, for my parents are respectable people, and they have every confidence in me."

"It'll be in the evening papers to-night. Jack Kinsley, that newspaper man, knew who the swells were, and they'll publish all their names and make a sensation out of it."

"Well, no matter; I didn't give my right name. Say, do you know I think it's a shame for a girl like you to be here in such a life. You're fit for something better. Why don't you go home?"

"I haven't any."

"You must have had once."

"So long ago I don't remember much about it."

"Well, it seems strange, but you couldn't guess what I was thinking about while you were singing on Saturday evening in that place—my sister, who ran away from home about ten years ago and was never heard of again. Her name was Kitty"—the girl started slightly—"and she was a pretty little thing, so pretty that she got petted by everybody until she was vain and spoiled. When she was twelve years old she was the most beautiful young girl in the town and was sought and courted by everyone for her clever ways. We were not rich, and she didn't like the little household duties mother asked of her, and was always saying she would go out into the world some day and make a famous name and get rich and buy a home for all of us, for she was the most generous little creature, with all her faults. Father was going to give her the best education he could afford, and she was to have special training in music, for she gave promise of having a fine voice; but one day she ran away, and from that hour to this we have never heard a word from her, and we do not know whether she is dead or alive. She must be about your age now." He looked at her inquiringly. The girl had turned pale. She looked fixedly at him; her eyes seemed to penetrate through and through him, as though she suddenly saw something below the surface. Her breath came hurriedly through her lips.

"What is your real name?" she asked in a veiled voice. He started and reddened. "My real name," he stammered, "why, really."

She half rose from her chair and bent over the table toward him. With a quick motion she pushed up the sleeve over his arm and looked with starting eyes—"The scar!" she cried. "The scar! Tom, do you remember the morning you were hurt?"

He sprang up, white as death. "What do you mean?" he cried. "I am Tom Norton. Who are you?"

She swayed and put out her arms unsteadily.

"I'm Kitty," she said, and fainted.

They carried her into an anteroom, and when she had recovered Tom knelt beside her and took her hands in his.

"Kitty, come home with me," he said. "They've never forgotten you—they've always looked for you to come back; they've always loved you. And, oh, Kitty, don't you remember what good times we used to have playing together. Oh, come home, come home; it will be just like it used to be."

She turned away and groaned and hid her face in her hands. "No, Tom; I can't. They know."

"But they don't," he said; "and even if they did it wouldn't make any difference. Oh, Kitty, no wonder I thought of you when I heard you singing that night. Look, you have saved me; I'll never go there, or to any place like that again as long as I live. Come, we'll go home together and tell them all about it, and it'll be all right. You don't know how glad they'll be to see you."

"Listen," she gasped. "I'll never go; never in the world, unless you can tell me that they, they believed in me, for I haven't been as bad as you might think. I was ambitious, and thought that I would make a name; but it was too hard and I was too young, and then I took to drink; but I never forgot—I never forgot."

The tears rained down her face. He kissed her tenderly, and she clung to him in an agony of sobs.

"Kitty," he said, "your name has never been mentioned that mother didn't say she believed you'd never forget your early training. She's always believed in you, and so have we all."

That evening, when the 6:15 train at the Grand Central pulled out of the station a brother and sister seated in it were on their way home to a little Massachusetts town in the Berkshires, and a father and mother were frantic with delight over the telegram they had received:

"I've found Kitty. Will be home this evening. TOM"

BOOKS RECEIVED

Love Idylls, by S. R. Crockett, author of "The Raiders," "The Lilac Sunbonnet," "Joan of the Sword Hand," etc. This is a volume of short stories, capably told in the author's characteristic style. The leading stories are "The Fitting of the Peats," and "The Count and Little Gertrude," and these are supplemented by seven other shorter sketches, each with a plot and interest of its own. A delightful volume for leisure hours. Pp. 315; cloth. Price $1.50. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York, publishers.

A Dream of Empire, or the House of Blennerhassett, by William Henry Venable. This belongs to the class of historical novels, and the leading characters in the tale are Aaron Burr and Harman Blennerhassett. Burr's ambitious plot to stir up war with Mexico, divide the Union and create an empire of the South and West furnishes the theme, and the course of his political intrigues is closely followed. A book well worth reading. Pp. 344; cloth covers. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York, publishers.

GRATEFUL ARMENIAN CHILDREN

THOSE who aided with this paper in the work of caring for orphans left homeless and helpless by Armenian massacres, will rejoice to see in the following letters that their good deeds are bringing forth much fruit in Mardin, as well as in other places in Turkey, from which they have heard through similar communications previously published. Rev. C. Dewey, of the American Mission at Mardin, writes, Sept. 2, 1901:

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: Your check for the last $100 of the $1,200 you promised us three years ago, towards the support of orphans, was received promptly. Our heartiest thanks are due to the friends of humanity, who, by their generous gifts, have enabled us to help a few of the thousands of orphans thrown upon the world homeless and destitute by the sad events of 1895. At the very outset we found we were undertaking no light task. Difficulties innumerable, and apparently insuperable, sprung up before us. It was a Godsend to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's promise of $1,200, to be paid in quarterly instalments of $100 each, running through three years. Our aim from the first has been to give to these children the fostering care of a Christian home, and to develop in them manly and womanly character, thus fitting them, not only to care for themselves, but to be helpful to others. Some are being prepared to take responsible situations as teachers. Manual training has been introduced. All the boys have had some instruction in carpentry and weaving, while the girls are being trained for household work.

I enclose two letters (in Arabic, with translations), in which two lads speak for themselves:

To Our Honored and Esteemed Friends:—May God prolong their lives, Amen! After kissing your hands and asking about your welfare, I thank you for your favor and kindness to me. I pray to God constantly for you.

Musa is fourteen years old and is ready to enter the High School. The writer of the next is eighteen; he is one of the most advanced of our orphans. His father, a leading member of the Protestant church in Kutturbul, was killed in the massacres. He is an earnest, sturdy fellow, and though not at all brilliant is steady and reliable. As he says, he will graduate from the High School next summer, and then will be ready to take up work as a teacher.

To Our Beloved and Honored Friends:—May God preserve them. We tender you our heartfelt thanks for what you have done for us in these four years. Though God has taken our parents from us he has raised you up in the place of parents, to us and has caused you to care for us and bring us along to the point where we can care for ourselves and begin to help others also. From the time when your servant came under your care until now it is four years. In one more year I shall finish the prescribed course of studies in our school and take the graduating certificate. Then I will teach. Kissing your beloved hands. Amen.

Pharaoh's Brick

IN connection with the Sunday School Lesson explained on page 908, the following extract from an article written for THE RED LETTER BIBLE by that eminent scholar, Dr. T. F. Wright, is of special interest: "The brick of which I send you a photograph is made of Nile mud and chopped straw. Stamped upon it is the cartouche or signature of Rameses II, who is now recognized as the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites, and compelled them to make bricks and build his treasure cities. Professor Petrie has traced the Egyptians from the beginning, when the people used flint instruments only. Then came a race tilling the soil, then a race knowing metals; and then a period of decay set in, and what he calls the 'first cycle' was completed. Next came a 'race from the Red Sea,' whose first king was Mena, and Petrie has found his tomb and body. Some account of all this is given in the report of the Egyptian Exploration Fund for 1900. Some of the earliest attempts in art are most interesting.

"Long after Mena the Israelites were in Egypt, and here belongs the hard face of Rameses II., who was the oppressor of Israel. His body, found a few years since, lies in the museum at Cairo, and confirms, by its very look, the account of the hard master who set taskmasters over the Children of Israel, and compelled the people to build for him the forts or treasure cities of Pithom and Raamses.

"Not only has the body of Pharaoh been found, but we can go to the treasure city Pithom, mentioned in Exodus 1, 2, and see the thick walls built of both kinds of brick, with and without straw."

Suffering in Russia

There is a report of severe famine in Russia. $48,000 has been appropriated for the government of Saratoff; $203,000 for Tauris; $50,000 for the non-military peasants in the Don basin, and $95,000, with a supply of autumn seed, for Yekaterinslaiff. The government's famine fund is $265,000, and the Emperor ordered it increased to $7,000,000.

Revival Work in New York

THE three famous Noon-day Prayer-Meetings at Fulton street, old John street, and Greenwich street, in New York, have taken on new life this fall, conducted, as they are, under the auspices of the Twentieth Century National Gospel Campaign. For the entire month of October, Fulton street is in charge of Rev. David James Burrell, D.D., Greenwich street of Rev. J. F. Carson, D.D., and old John street of Rev. Theodore S. Henderson, D.D.

At Greenwich street, Rev. Dr. Carson referred to President McKinley's death, relating several instances of conversion as a result. He told of a leading Christian merchant of Brooklyn, who had often talked in vain to a friend, a man of the world, about his relations to God. The day after William McKinley's funeral, this friend walked into the office of the merchant, and reaching out his hand, said, "Come, it's all settled!" "What is settled?" was the reply. "My relations with God," replied the former man of the world. "The way President McKinley died is the way my father and mother died, and their religion is good enough for me." Another man had been converted and joined the church while young, but had fallen away and for many years had gone the way of the world, till the President's triumphant Christian death turned him back to the Saviour.

Dr. Henderson, at John Street Meeting, told of a policeman who recently joined his church. He had been picked up out of the gutter by a Christian policeman, who took him to his own home, instead of to the station house, and led him to Christ. "I know several men on the force just like these," said the speaker. Not long since I was called to Brooklyn to baptize the children of a policeman who is a member of Cuyler Chapel, and a most consistent Christian.

At the Fulton Street meeting, where Dr. Burrell has charge, many unusual requests for prayer are received. One was from a Southern minister, asking for prayers that his wife might cease swearing and turn from all her evil ways!

From these simultaneous meetings, held at the same time that the second year's appeal is circulated broadcast by the National Central Committee, it is the hope of the Committee that there may be an awakening to more earnest prayer and service throughout the nation.

AN EVANGELIST'S REUNION

Rev. H. W. Brown's Visit to the East after Series of Labors in Distant Cities

CHURCHES and conventions in the East and Middle States have been cheered during the summer by the presence of a well-known worker whose labors of late years have been given to the West. Rev. Hugh W.

REV. HUGH W. BROWN

Brown has had a hearty and cordial welcome wheresoever he appeared, and has had the gratification of seeing that Christian people do not soon forget their absent friends.

Mr. Brown looks as if the promise to Christ's servants, that they who wait on the Lord shall renew their strength, had been fulfilled in his case. The passage of years has left little trace on form or features, and his voice has the old-time power and compass. There is little to show that for nearly thirty-five years he has been going from place to place, often by rough ways of travel, and preaching the Gospel in all kinds of surroundings. During the past year he has labored in Texas, Wyoming and Colorado, besides filling long-promised engagements in various parts of Illinois. It has been a year of abundant blessing. Looking back over it, Mr. Brown is filled with thankfulness for the evidences of divine help which have been manifested in many ways and places. Especially in mining towns, the work has prospered. In one rough town, of about 5,000 population, 140 persons were led to make confession of Christ, and in other towns there were similar gatherings.

It has been a great pleasure to the indefatigable worker to meet old friends at Ocean Grove, N. J., where he opened the great meeting of Sept. 8 with prayer; at the Christian Alliance Convention at Nyack, N. Y., where he took a prominent part in the exercises; and at the Baptist Young People's Union Convention, in Chicago, at which he is ever a welcome speaker. He was planning a tour for the fall and winter on the Pacific Coast, which he purposed extending to Oregon, Washington, and possibly Alaska. Urgent requests were, however, made to him to spend the coming season in the East, and many tempting opportunities for labor were placed before him. These he is now considering, with a strong probability of accepting them. His permanent address is 7331 Seward ave., Chicago, Ill.

Hugh Miller on Geological Prophecies

These latent scientific prophecies seem to have been so deeply imbedded in the sacred text that the world has not seen them hitherto, nor indeed could see them now, were it not that our advancing science is revealing them. The geologic prophecies, though they might have been read, could not be understood till the fullness of the time had come. It is only in the brighter light of increasing scientific knowledge that these grand old oracles of the Bible, so apparently simple, but so marvelously pregnant with meaning, stand forth at once cleared of all erroneous human glosses, and vindicated as the inspired testimonies of Jehovah.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING FOR JESUS?

() H, what are you doing for Jesus?
In a world full of sorrow and sin,
Are you winning some souls for his kingdom
When there are so many to win?

() H, what are you doing for Jesus?
What are you doing to-day?

Jesus has called you for service—
O, ask him to show you the way.

O, what are you doing for Jesus?

You are gifted on purpose to do Something useful to honor the Master
Who sorrowed and suffered for you.

O, somewhere do something for Jesus,
For the years travel swift in their flight;
Whatsoever good thing your hand findeth,
Delay not to do with your might.

When life and its work shall be over,
When you enter the city afar,
Surely you will not wish to be wearing
A crown that has never a star!

MRS. FRANK A. BRECK.

Thriving Under Discipline

Egyptian Oppression of the Jews Defeating Its Own Purposes

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEREVER God's people are to be found, they must be reckoned with; they are always a power for good or for evil. Israel is God's outward, earthly people, chosen to be a blessing to the nations; but in this respect "they are not all Israel which are of Israel" (Rom. 9: 6). Joseph had indeed been blest and made a blessing according to God's promise to his forefather Abraham (Gen. 12: 2), because he wholly followed the Lord who was "with him." But now Joseph had "died, and all his brethren, and all that generation. And the children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them" (Exod. 1: 6, 7). Abraham, who had learned to wait so confidently for the fulfillment of the promises of his God, passed out of this world, seeing as his descendants, according to the promise, only Isaac, Esau, and Jacob. He died in faith, not having received the promises, but having "seen them and greeted them from afar" (Heb. 11: 13); but he saw the day of Christ, and was glad (John 8: 56), and as a stranger and pilgrim on the earth proved that he sought after a country of his own, a city prepared for him, the heavenly Jerusalem which cometh down out of heaven (comp. Heb. 11: 14-16; 12: 22-24; Rev. 21).

But the promise that he should be the father of a great multitude began to be fulfilled, first in the family of Jacob, which, when entering Egypt, numbered already seventy grown men, and which during four generations, the four hundred years of their sojourning there, had increased to six hundred and twenty-three thousand seven hundred and thirty. All through their history the Jews have been a people who have multiplied more than the people of other lands, and their increase in the last two generations has been enormous. In Russia, which contains more Jews than any other land at the present time, notwithstanding much oppression and persecution, they multiply so fast that Russia does not know what to do with them. The Jews throughout the earth have nearly, if not quite, doubled in number during the last half century—a sure sign that the times of the Gentiles are coming to an end.

What are we to do with the Hebrews? was, in Moses' time, the question before the government of Egypt. What are we to do with the Jews? is the one problem which forces itself upon the Russian and German Emperors and the Sultan of Turkey. How are we to compete with the Jews? is the question among the financiers of the world. How are we to keep pace with the Jews? is the question in many a branch of commerce. And the time is coming when the jealousy of the populations will say what the "new king" (introducing a new dynasty) of Egypt said to his people, "Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we [or "too many and too mighty for us."] Come, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply, and it cometh to pass that, when there falleth out any war, they also join themselves unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them up out of the land."

Human politics, which leave God out of count! None can touch his children but by his permission. But he did permit. Why was this? Instead of being like Joseph, a blessing to the Egyptians, and bearing witness to their God, the children of Israel had fallen into idolatry. God said to them, "Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt: 'I am the Lord your God. But . . . they did not every man cast away the abominations of their eyes, neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt" (Ezek. 20: 7, 8). Just in measure as we fall under the power of evil example in others, we are in their power, just in measure as we stand with God among those who know him not, he gives us power over them, as he gave to his servant Joseph.

Two kings were reigning over Egypt at this time, Seti and his son Rameses II., who reigned as his coadjutor. "Therefore they [these two kings] did set over them [the children of Israel] taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh store cities, Pithom and Raamses. But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew." No measures of man's oppression could controvert the word of the living God. He willed that this people should multiply, and they always have multiplied, and always will. Again and again their enemies have determined to exterminate them, but after the most awful massacres which have cut off hundreds of thousands of them, they have sprung up again like the grass. After nearly two thousand years without a land, with no national status in the earth, their very language ceasing to be a living language, they have a vigor which no other people possesses; they live and flourish in every climate, speak every language, they can accustom themselves to any circumstances, and they retain everywhere their individuality. A Jew is always a Jew, whether English, American, French, German, Russian, Greek, Italian, Spanish, etc.

"The Egyptians were grieved [R. V. margin, "abhorred"] because of the children of Israel. Jealousy leads to hatred. "And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigor; and they made their lives bitter with hard bondage; in mortar and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field; all their service wherein they made them serve was with rigor." The persecution of the Jews in Russia and Roumania at the present day, although it is on another line, is equally severe. They are shut out from many kinds of employment, permitted to hold very little property, only a certain percentage are permitted to study as physicians, etc., and the restrictions are such as to keep millions of them in a state of semi-starvation. Yet the more they afflict them, the more they multiply and grow, and it cannot be long before we see them again, where God says they will be, in their own land. Whether this will come to pass through the Zionist movement, which, in five years, has two thousand adherents among them, or whether in some other way, we know that God's Word will be fulfilled. Nothing can stand against the Word of the Most High. He must ever be supreme.

The oppression of Israel and their deliverance was foretold by God to Abraham, when God came unto him in a vision, and a "horror of great darkness came upon him. And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation whom they serve will I judge; and afterward they shall come out with great substance. . . . in the fourth generation they shall come hither again" (Gen. 12: 16). And the present scattered condition of Israel was foretold to Moses, and also the return of the people to their own land, when they should confess their sins (Lev. 26: 33-45). But Ezekiel tells us of a gathering of Israel into their own land and a subsequent repentance (Ezek. 36: 24-36). And this may be what Zephaniah refers to in the words, "Gather yourselves together; yea, gather together, O nation that hath no shame, before the decree bring forth." This looks like the Zionist movement; a gathering together which does not wait for the Lord's decree.

If God's chosen people of old could not depart from him and worship the idols of Egypt without bringing upon themselves oppression and humiliation from the idolaters among whom they lived, can we, who are now as individuals in the school of God, expect that our education can be conducted without suffering? Truly this is the day of grace, and we are not under the law, but the law is written upon our hearts. There is a judgment, as well as an education, in the discipline, through which, as individuals, we have to go. "If we would judge ourselves we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened [educated] of the Lord that we should not be condemned with the world" (1 Cor. 11: 31, 32). As Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph each had his special education, so is it with each member of Christ's body.

A Little Child's Influence

When the pastor and congregation of the African Methodist Church of Kingston, N. Y., several months ago, decided to rebuild their frail old church, which had been almost demolished by storms, a little member of the flock took a prominent part in the general effort. This young worker was Julia Cuspell. She had been baptized in the church, and had almost grown up in its shadow, from babyhood. While yet a mere toddler in short dresses, Julia developed unusual musical talent. Soon she learned to sing very sweetly the old church hymns, and to play the organ, both of which she did to the delight of the congregation. Her zeal in helping to raise the building fund was an inspiration to many in the church. A few weeks ago, the little congregation was saddened to hear of her serious illness, and when their little singer was called away by death, they mourned as though every family had been bereft of a dear one. Julia was buried in the little Kingston Cemetery on the same day upon which the late President M. K. K. was laid to rest in London. The pastor of the Kingston Church, Rev. P. F. Matthews, will gladly acknowledge on behalf of the congregation any aid that may be extended in rebuilding their church.

GOSPEL IN THE MINES

Missionary Tour Among the Lonely Camps of Central Wyoming

THE road northwest from Rawlins, Wyo., is only traveled by the stage from Fort Washakie, a few ranchmen and emigrants. Deep sand along the road makes traveling a very slow operation. The have cleaned up all the grass near where camping would be possible. The water in the small creeks and lagoons is strong of alkali that the banks are covered with the white deposit. Cowboys tell a story of these little lakes, whose waters are strong enough to bear up an egg.

Fifty miles from the stage road, and 150 miles from Rawlins, we found the first of a group of mining camps—a community of several families, a store and several saloons, but no one interested in religious things. We told, however, that the young lady who taught school there in winter was a Christian, and her influence was still felt in the camp. Five miles away, up a woody canon, we found a town larger than the first, known as Atlantic. Here we found people anxious for Gospel teaching, and we announced a meeting for the next day, the Sabbath. That afternoon we drove over the hills four miles to South Pass City, where we expected to see the mines operating, but the men were standing around the streets with their best clothes on. We were approached by the mine manager who asked for the preacher of our party. He informed us that two of his miners—George F. Lange and Luther M. Duling—had been killed the night before by a premature explosion, and they were waiting for the coffins to be brought by wagon from Lander. We conducted the funeral service. It is their custom to bury the dead without any service save a prayer read by one of the men.

We were able next day to organize promising schools in both South Pass City and Atlantic. At South Pass City, we found earnest men and women anxious to have their children enjoy religious privileges. Although we found no church members, we secured suitable officers and teachers. At Atlantic, we were fortunate in meeting a young man who had been a church member in the city and who became superintendent of our school at the earnest request of the people. The only church member Atlantic had for years was an old lady, who died last year and was buried without a prayer; she was a Methodist. We are hoping that these points may some day be grouped as a Presbyterian Church.

Four miles north of Lander, we organized a very encouraging school at Milford, on the north fork of the Popoagie River. Ten miles east of Lander, we found a community in the south fork of Popoagie, similar to Milford, and here, also, we organized a good school. The people here, at Lyons and at Milford, were anxious to have regular preaching services.

Many of the homes visited, we found no traces of Christianity. In some we found copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the only religious paper we saw on our trip. It has proved its silent sermons and carried the Gospel into homes that have never been visited by any missionary before.

Lonic, Wyo. JAMES LYNCH.

Still Working to Save Miss Stone

Up to October 21, the efforts to rescue Miss Stone from her brigand abductors had not proved successful, although the negotiations were still progressing. She had that date been forty-six days a captive. Four thousand Turkish and Bulgarian troops were still on the border, and the authorities of both countries were making strenuous efforts for her release, although Bulgaria absolutely denies complicity in or responsibility for the outrage. Bulgaria refuses to take any part in the ransom negotiations. Opinion is again divided concerning the political aspect of the affair and it is still believed that the Macedonian Revolutionary Committee has been a party to the kidnapping. Some of the able despatches state that another letter has been received from Mme. Tsia, Miss Stone's companion, begging that the pursuit of the outlaws be stopped, lest they murder the captives. Their hiding place, she says, is underground. The Rev. R. W. Thompson, of the Sofia Theological Institute, says the captives are suffering great hardships, being strapped upon horses, and taken from place to place in severe weather, Miss Stone being clad in light summer garments. Their food is coarse bread and roasted mountain sheep. It is reported that two other missionaries, Messrs. Baird and Haskell, who were conducting the ransom negotiations with the brigands, have not been heard from, and apprehension is felt for their safety.

OUR NATIONAL BONDAGE*

Messages of Impending Ruin to a People in the Enjoyment of National Prosperity

SAD and apparently hopeless was the mission undertaken by both the prophets, whose words, with a singular lack of perception, are associated with the topic. They were alarmed by the dangers menacing the prosperous kingdom of Israel. They warned the people that their destruction was inevitable. It was true that God was able to protect them. Mighty as was the great kingdom of Assyria, it was as nothing in his sight. He could deliver his people from any and every enemy. But why should he do so? His people were unfaithful to him and were disregarding his law. The fact of their relations to him was all the more reason why he should not interpose on their behalf. He had done so much for them that he might naturally expect they would prove a righteous nation. They had not done so; they were like the heathen nations and were much more culpable, because they knew better and were under greater obligations. God might overlook the wickedness of their neighbors, but he could not tolerate the iniquity of the people whom he had delivered and who were called by his name. It is true that they were attentive to the national worship and made liberal offerings, but these were a mockery while they were morally corrupt. It was as if they were trying to bribe God with offerings to bear with their selfishness, their oppression of the poor, and their immorality. God could not be treated in that way, and he already had an instrument of punishment at hand in the Assyrian king.

The gist of the message of the two prophets was an indictment of the nation and a warning that punishment was approaching. The people did not heed the message. It was a time of prosperity, and the rich were too intent on their pleasures and their luxury, and the poor too harassed by the awful burden of their poverty to attend to the preachers. Besides, the message was an unpopular one. They might have caught the popular ear if they had bragged about the greatness of the country; quoted statistics of the crops and congratulated the people on their prosperity. But they were not optimists, and they were more distressed by the sins they witnessed than delighted by the signs of wealth and luxury around them. They laid bare the evil under the surface and declared that God would punish such a nation. So they were despised and condemned as pessimists and croakers, and things went on in their old way. Such preachers would receive similar treatment now among us. Yet, some such message is needed. We have become too proud and arrogant. Our prosperity has intoxicated us. Because as a nation we are so rich, we are disposed to congratulate ourselves and to ignore the gigantic evils that are leavening society. It is true the gifts to colleges, libraries, and Christian institutions were never so large as now; that religion is outwardly honored, and that we call ourselves a Christian nation. But there are enough blots beneath the decorous exterior to arouse concern. Our worship of wealth, our indifference to the suffering of the poor, our awful divorce record, the appalling immorality prevailing in our great cities, the scepticism and open infidelity to be met with everywhere are ominous signs of national corruption, which all history shows to be the precursors of national decadence. Like ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome we are being tested by prosperity. Woe to us if we yield as they did.

The evil, which is the special subject for the day, is in itself a very serious menace to the nation. Statistics show that drunkenness is on the increase among us. Close observers tell us that it is now affecting our women, which is a most ominous sign. Of all the reforms that our nation needs, there is none that would do so much for its betterment as the reform of our drinking customs. Intoxicating liquor is the fruitful cause of poverty and crime. Wheresoever it is withdrawn from a community, that community becomes more peaceful, more prosperous and more law-abiding. The liquor habit destroys the moral tone of the individual. He becomes lazy in his sober moments, and either a fool or a ferocious animal when he is intoxicated. Unhappily, the habit is so insidious that the victim is enslaved before he is aware of his danger. At first he knows that he can stop drinking at any time. But he likes it, and as he is sure that for him there is no danger, he continues drinking. Gradually the stimulant becomes necessary. He misses it when, through any cause, he abstains for a day or two. Then the habit becomes imperious, and after a time he is unable to abstain. Thousands among us are treading that dangerous course. The most hopeful way of reform is to begin with the young. To convince them that the way of abstinence is the way of safety; to encourage them to like water as a beverage; to make them understand that liquor is in no way beneficial to their health, and to induce them to make no beginning in the pernicious habit—these are the ways in which we may hope that the next generation may be a more sober one than this. The social reformer could engage in no work so patriotic as this. His success would do more for the elevation of the people than any other to which he could set his hand.

CHRISTIANITY AND WAR :::

Continued

defense of life and home on the one hand, and offering on the other the coveted rewards of conquest. No branch of industry has played so great a part in the civilization and enlightenment of mankind as the development of implements of war.

Without the stimulus afforded by the constant menace of neighboring powers, a nation may allow its arts and sciences to remain stationary, as China has done for the last thousand years.

Stimulated by the menace of war, however, all this is changed, and the ingenuity of the people is taxed to its utmost to meet the peril. The discovery and introduction of gunpowder called for a complete revolution in military implements and operations. Since then, improvements in weapons have kept pace with improvements in gunpowder, and improvements in all the arts and sciences have followed. The development and perfection of gunpowder, and the harnessing of that energy which can now hurl a half-ton bolt of solid steel through three feet of iron, has been a giant task, and could only be accomplished by corresponding accomplishments in other industries.

Nothing ought to be plainer to the intelligent mind than the likeness between an efficient military system and an efficient police system.

There have, however, in recent years, been voiced in the press many dreams of impracticable peace theorists, who cry out against the inhumanity of modern implements of war. If these theorists will look into the past, they will see that the history of nations is the history of wars, and we may tell these same peace lovers that but for the great bulwarks erected by the sons of Mars along their frontiers the pretty general peace which the world now enjoys could not last for a day.

As to the results upon civilization of improvements in implements of war, there can be but one interpretation, and that is that more will be done by money and machinery, and less fighting will be done by hand, thus permitting and demanding that larger numbers remain at home engaged in industrial pursuits, while the home is defended less by blood and more by the fruits of industry.

The inventors of deadly engines of war are in the hands of scientific and enlightened nations the means of controlling wars. Such inventions have put an end to the time when barbarian hordes can overrun and subdue the earth, to ravage, destroy and enslave, by sheer brute force and power of numbers.

A Little Band's Work

"We are very busy with a large school and helpers as usual," writes Rev. Dr. E. H. Richards, in his last letter from Inhambane, Africa, in acknowledging receipt of $5 from our Bishop Taylor Industrial Band. In Middletown, Connecticut, 1893, under the leadership of Bishop William Taylor, ten persons banded themselves together, to give not less than $1 per year for mission work in Africa. Bishop Taylor, in 1897, resigned his work in Africa, and the payments were made to Dr. Edwin Richards, a most consecrated and earnest missionary, who for more than twenty years has been giving his life for the salvation of the heathen in a vast region, where he says "The harvest is great and the laborers few."

At present, Dr. Richards is in need of educated Christian lady to supervise one of his schools. This, too, is a famine year for him, and he is in special need of financial help. Our little mission band here has been depleted by death and by other removals, so that only three or four of our original members remain. We cannot do at we would, yet we do not forget the doctor's words: "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." Our donations to Dr. Richards have gone for school-work; closely calculated, $12 provides food and education for a child in his home-school for a year.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The usual five new questions are omitted this week, in order that other letters to "The Mail-Bag," many of them long delayed, may receive attention. Hereafter, once a month, the entire page will be devoted to this class of letters.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

Sam. B., Trenton, N. J. 1. What is the religion of Czolgosz, the assassin of the President? 2. I understand that he was fairly well educated. Am I right?

1. He was baptized a Catholic in the Polish Church of Detroit, but forsook all religion when he embraced the doctrines of anarchy. This is his own statement. 2. He could neither read nor write, never attended any school, and went to no church. This he told the superintendent of the Albany prison.

L. R. B., Indianapolis, Ind. Please give the meaning of the floral emblems used so much in church architecture and religious literature.

In the passion-flower some have thought they found the crucifixion symbolized—the leaves representing the head of the spear which pierced our Lord's side; the tendrils, the cords binding him; the pillar in the centre, the cross; the stamens, the hammers, and so on. The rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley are emblems of humility and of our Lord; the rose is also a type of the Saviour. The Easter lily is used as a symbol of the annunciation, and of the Virgin Mary; also of the festival whose name it bears. The laurel is for victory and glory; ivy and laurestinus, constancy and immortality; the little white flower called Star of Bethlehem, is the Advent and Epiphany emblem; the fleur-de-lis, snow-drop and marigold, are sometimes used as the Virgin's emblems; the heart-shaped pansy is the emblem of charity; cypress and rosemary, of the grave, the tree of the former, on being cut, never revives; rosemary flourishes the better for clipping; the trefoil, or conventional representation of a three-leaved plant like clover, is an emblem of the Trinity.

L. J. E., Snapping Shoals, Ga. A pastor is requested by the negroes of the colored churches in the community to preach for them when he is not otherwise engaged. His congregations object on the ground that it is not customary, and will hurt his influence with white people who are out of Christ. What is his duty in the matter?

We do not know how people who are "out of Christ" will regard his accepting the invitation, but we believe that all who have Christ's spirit would approve of his doing so. They subscribe for sending missionaries to India and Africa, and they honor the men who go; so there would be no logical reason for their disapproving of a white minister working in colored churches at home. The duty is certainly nearer, and there is all the greater reason to rejoice if, by his preaching, the colored people are helped and brought into a clearer and better understanding of the principles of Christianity.

Helen S. S., Bellingham, Mass. If the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart so that he did not let the people go, how was it possible for him to do otherwise than he did?

The true interpretation is that the Divine message of warning and the plagues which followed were the occasion of Pharaoh's heart being hardened. Thus the expression which has been translated as "hardened," is, in Hebrew, "strong" implying that the influence of the events had been to make the king's heart stubborn or rebellious. (See Ex. 7:13, 14; 8:19, and 9:35). Elsewhere in the same narrative the Hebrew expression is capable of being translated "made heavy" (as in Ex. 7:14 and 8:15 and 32; also Ex. 9:34). The passage in Ex. 7:23, which may be rendered as in the Authorized Version, and also as "he (Pharaoh) set his heart even to this," expresses the condition of Egypt's ruler, who had set his face like a flint against Jehovah, and was alternately depressed and defiant, but not repentant.

J. W. C., Trinidad, W. I. What is the Monroe Doctrine, and how did it originate?

President Monroe, in his annual message to Congress in 1823, embodied a clause, declaring that the United States should consider any attempt on the part of the European powers to "extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety"; also, that "the American continents, by their free and independent position which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers." This declaration was called forth by the attitude of the European alliance, which was believed to contemplate the reduction of the Spanish colonies in America, then in a state of revolt. The United States had already recognized the independence of these colonies.

Sunday School Scholar, Dallas, Tex. When was the first Bible printed?

In 1450-55, at Mentz, Germany. It was in two folio volumes, contained 1,282 pages; a few copies are still in existence. The work is of much excellence and beauty. This, we understand, is not only the first Bible, but also the first book ever printed.

Anxious Inquirer, Plainfield, N. H. What constitutes a call to the ministry? Is a sense of the burden of souls, a desire to work in the Lord's vineyard and a willingness to obey Christ's commands sufficient?

More than these are necessary. There should be fitness and capacity for the work. This can be tested by giving addresses in Sunday Schools and at mission churches, which can be done by persons engaged in

Mrs. C. F. E., Chesterland, O. 1. Where in the Bible may be found good authority for capital punishment? 2. Is it according to the teachings of Christ?

1. See Gen. 9:6. 2. No; see Rom. 12:19; Heb. 10:30.

L. A. W., Hamilton, N. Y. May the casting of the ballot, for any particular policy of government, become a moral duty, in so far that the minister should pass upon the moral quality of the proposed policy and preach the duty of voting for or against it?

There are extreme cases, involving some great moral public question, national, State or municipal, in which a pastor would be justified in advocating from the pulpit the cause of righteousness and good government and in urging his people to support that cause. In such cases, he should be able to rise above mere considerations of faction, and to make it quite clear that he is not a partisan or electioneer, but is actuated by higher motives. Ordinarily, however, the pulpit should leave politics alone. The preacher who turns the pulpit into a campaign platform is apt to alienate one part of his congregation and lose private, to say the least of it; and because Christmas falls on Sunday, would not justify it. Sunday School exercises might pass as they do at Easter, of the nature of devotional; and any pious form of family rejection would certainly be in order. The correct answer to this question depends altogether on what you mean by "entertainment."

D. K. Williamsport, Pa. Was ever a Catholic ruler assassinated? Please give the different rulers that have been assassinated and their religious belief.

1. A larger number of Roman Catholic rulers than those of any other faith have been assassinated—this, of course, applies to Christian countries. In heathen lands, assassinations have been legion. The following list gives the most notable assassinations of rulers since that of the great pagan, Julius Caesar, 44 B. C.: Albert I., German Emperor, 1308; James I., Scotland, 1437; James, King of Scotland, 1570; Henry III. and Henry IV., France, 1589, 1610; Charles III., Duke of Parma, 1854; Michael, Prince of Serbia, 1883; President Carnot, France, 1894; Elizabeth, Austrian Empress, 1898; King Humbert, Italy, 1900; all Roman Catholics, although Henry IV. of France (Henry of Navarre) is believed, was at heart a Protestant. In England's assassinated sovereigns—Edward II., Richard II., Henry VI., and Edward—were Roman Catholics, for it was only with Henry VIII. that England became Protestant. Gustavus III., of Sweden, 1792, was a Lutheran. Marat, of France, stabbed by Charlotte Corday, was more infidel than anything else. In Russia, out of eight sovereigns from Ivan IV. to Alexander II., all have been assassinated. They belonged to the Greek church. Sultan Abdul Aziz of Turkey, 1876, and Nasreddin, Shah of Persia, 1896, were Mohammedans. Earl Mayo, Governor-General of India, 1872, was a Protestant. William, the Silent, of Orange, 1584, was a Protestant. Lincoln, Garfield and McKinley were Protestants.

In Doubt. Is it a sin for a pure Christian young woman to marry a man who has led an immoral life?

It would assuredly be a very great evil, morally and in every other way, to make such a choice deliberately; yet, if the sinner is truly repented and reformed, we can understand how it might be. Ordinarily speaking a woman who makes such a choice, unless she has absolute evidence of the man's thorough reformation, invites a lifetime of misery and regret.

A PERSONAL LETTER FROM DR. KLOPSCH

I APPEAL to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to co-operate with me in a matter that gives me great concern. Most of our readers correctly suspect that my life is a very busy one. Time has become a very important factor with me, and the problem ever before me is that of reducing matters to such a system that the handling of them may involve no needless waste in that direction.

My first care is, of course, the proper and satisfactory administration of CHRISTIAN HERALD affairs, and it is in connection with these that I invite your help. During the present month, it is comparatively easy to ship premiums and renew subscriptions promptly. During December we receive from 10,000 to 15,000 letters a day, and it is difficult then to handle the business to the entire satisfaction of our subscribers—particularly on account of the pressure on mail and express facilities incident to the Holiday Season.

If our own subscribers would co-operate with us, by renewing during November, we could give them the best service; and that is what we are planning to do. Neither delays by mail, nor by express would then interfere with their plans or ours. To ensure this best and promptest service to the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family is the object of this appeal.

Renew NOW. You lose nothing, as your subscription will be dated ahead from the present date of expiry, and not from the date of your remittance. You will thus help me personally more than you can imagine, and relieve me of much care and anxiety, for which I shall be ever grateful. I want to please you; HELP ME TO DO IT.

business. If the addresses are effective, if God blesses them to the conversion of the hearers, there is evidence of a call to the ministry. The experiment does not imply inferiority of the sphere, but that the test can be more easily made in that way than by a regular sermon in a church. Then there is a question of circumstances. If the way to the ministry is beset with difficulties, there is ground for doubt of the call, because God opens the way to those whom he calls to serve him.

L. E. G., Brooklyn, N. Y. I have heard that the Higher Criticism repudiates all belief in miracles. Is that so?

No, it has nothing to do with the question of the credibility of miracles. Its work is done on the construction of the books of the Bible. It proceeds on the theory that most of the books are compilations of older documents, and that the compilations were revised and edited by later scholars after they were made. Many of the theories advanced by the Higher Critics are rejected by conservative scholars. Dr. Green, of Princeton, vigorously upheld the homogeneity of the Pentateuch, which is a crucial question.

H. F. B., East Orange, N. J. 1. Where did the name Apostle's Creed first originate and why named? 2. What are the Apples of Sodom? 3. What is the Applan Way?

1. It is held by some early writers that this creed was composed by the Apostles themselves, during their stay at Jerusalem after Christ's ascension, and that it was agreed upon as a rule of faith. Tradition adds that "each contributed his sentence and left it as a rule to be given to all believers." 2. A fruit found in the Plain of Jordan and near the Dead Sea, tempting to the eye, but bitter in taste and filled only with air, and a silky seed, like that of the silk-weed. 3. It is the highway from Rome to Brundisium, which was constructed by Appius Claudius.

the respect of at least some portion of the other part.

Reader. A man of well-known piety is appointed by his pastor to lead the evening prayer-meetings. Is he justified in leaving his wife alone with her small children at their home "in the woods" to attend these services?

Such questions must be referred to the individual conscience. If husband and wife both clearly see it to be his duty to answer the call, he should go. The wife may aid and strengthen him by her own prayers during his absence. There may be cases, however, in which the husband would not be justified in leaving, but these are exceptional. He should try to arrange to have his wife accompany him, if possible.

M. G., Knoxville, Tenn. Who wore the first bridal veil mentioned in Scripture?

Rebekah; when she "lighted off the camel" and went to meet Isaac, who was meditating "in the fields at eventide," and looking for her, she "took a veil and covered herself."

Margaret M., Mentor, Kan. 1. Why should the celebration of Christ's birthday begin the day before—why should we have Christmas Eve?

2. If Christmas falls on a Sunday, is it a violation of the Fourth Commandment if the regular Christmas entertainment is held thereon?

1. Jewish festivals began in Christ's time, as they do now, with the even. It was natural that in this respect Christian custom should follow Hebrew, Christ, his disciples, and nearly all of his followers being of that nationality. The celebration of many more holidays begin by practice, if not by statute, the night before, New Year's Eve being an illustration in point. If, too, we consider Christ's birthday as consisting of twenty-four hours, beginning with the even, we see a very natural reason for the celebration of Christmas Eve as well as Christmas morning. 2. A worldly entertainment on Sunday is inappro-

MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE, CHICAGO

D. B. TOWNER, MUSICAL DIRECTOR

A GREAT CAMP of SOUL-WINNERS

.. The Moody Institute of Chicago and its Army of Young Workers for Christ ..

WHEN Dwight L. Moody, America's best-beloved evangelist passed from earth to heaven, it was feared lest the great work he had founded in Chicago, the Moody Bible Institute, would suffer from the want of his energizing presence and deep spiritual personality. That fear, however, as the event has proved, was groundless for the work he established, with the prayers and earnest struggles of many years, is to-day stronger and better than at any time in its history. His legacy to Christian America has been richly assessed and it has once more been demonstrated before the world that God permits no good work, established solely for his glory, to languish and fail, but prospers it abundantly and raises up friends and helpers on every side. Such has been the history of the Moody Bible Institute. Mr. Moody was president of its board of trustees, and had almost complete freedom in the control of affairs. He dictated its policy. He outlined plans of work, pursuing those methods of teaching and training that would reach out men and women such as his own varied and lengthy experience convinced him were much needed in the army of Christ. He was in constant personal touch with every phase of the work, receiving weekly and monthly reports. He raised, by his own prayer and efforts, practically all the money required for running expenses.

MISS E. S. STRONG, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT

The first year that elapsed after his death proved that he was a wise master-builder. It was the best year in every respect that the Institute had known. The attendance of students averaged higher than ever. The spiritual tone was good, the class-room work satisfactory. The place taken in the world by old students gave cause for increasing gratitude. The number of students enrolled in the men's department was 290, women's department 181; states and territories represented, 38; foreign countries represented, 18; denominations represented, 41. The evening classes showed an attendance aggregating 9,000, more students finishing the complete courses than ever before. The statistics are instructive, showing increased attendance and redoubled activity in all departments.

Practical religious work has always been a prime feature of the Institute curriculum. In the whole year 323 cottage meetings were conducted by men students, also 246 open-air meetings; the women conducted 112 mothers' meetings. Men and women students together held 986 children's meetings, 1,498 mission services, and 1,506 other religious services. This, in addition to hospital and other visits, invitation calls, and Sunday School work. Students are required not only to study the theory of Christian work, but also to engage in it personally. The homes and churches and missions, the police stations and car-barns, the prisons and poorhouses and other institutions in Chicago and vicinity, benefit by this ministry. In summer, people are gathered in the parks for open-air services and in tents. In every avenue of practical usefulness, the students are held ready to take advantage of opportunity. This work is, of course, supplementary to the regular studies at the Institute, but is by no means the least important part of the training.

More Moody students are now serving God in home and foreign fields than ever before. They are found in nearly every country under the sun. At the outbreak of the troubles in China, fifty-one former Moody students were heralds of the Christ in that great empire. Of these, two were called to suffer martyrdom. Five were in Peking throughout the siege. Many more were driven from their stations in the disturbed districts.

Twenty-two of last year's students are now preachers and singers in evangelistic work; nineteen are pastors, mostly in frontier and rural churches; thirteen are missionaries under the American Sunday School Union and other Boards; sixteen are home missionaries; eight are foreign missionaries; eleven are in city and rescue missions; nine are pastors' assistants and church missionaries; six are in educational work, as Bible teachers, etc.; five are Y. M. C. A. secretaries; four are Y. W. C. A. secretaries; one is a deaconess; one a hospital chaplain. Since the Institute was founded in 1889, two hundred and thirty-one students have gone to home, city and rescue missions, and among the North American Indians; two hundred and two have engaged in evangelistic work, as preachers and singers; three hundred and ninety-seven became pastors, pastors' assistants, church visitors and choristers; seventy-one are with the American Sunday Union and other Boards; thirty-four are Christian Association secretaries; one hundred and eighty-six are in foreign lands; forty-four are in educational and philanthropic work; sixty-four are superintendents of responsible institutions and organizations in the largest cities of this country and Canada.

The work of training men and women for Christian service, inaugurated by D. L. Moody at Chicago, in 1889, has resulted in the sending out of over 3,000 men and women during the twelve years that have elapsed since that time. They are scattered all over this land, and over 200 are in foreign fields. Mr. Moody is "yet speaking" through them, for the training in practical methods and the instruction in the English Bible they receive, are both framed along lines that he laid down. He saw the need in the churches of live, earnest workers, and the Moody Institute is the servant of the churches in trying to send out bands of men and women who shall hold up their pastors' hands, and help spread the news of the Gospel in neglected fields.

Out of many incidents that are reported from time to time in connection with the present work of former students of the Moody Institute, a few have been selected and are given below. These serve to prove that the Gospel is still the power of God unto salvation, when preached by self-sacrificing, spirit-filled workers.

Worked for Christ While Dying

"A few months ago," writes W. L. Crist, a former Moody student, now laboring in the Gospel field, "while engaged in evangelistic work in southwestern Iowa, God wonderfully blessed our labors, and some of the vilest sinners in the community accepted Christ as their Saviour. People marveled and wondered. Upon investigation, I learned that a few months before a very wicked young man of that vicinity had been converted on his deathbed. The day before his death he sent for all his friends, relatives and associates in sin, and told them about the Saviour he had found. After a private talk with each one, he would not let them go until they promised to meet him in heaven. Then offering a prayer to God to save them, he would turn and talk to another.

"This he did until a few minutes of his death. Of the sixty conversions, over two-thirds were those with whom he had talked and prayed. He had done all he could, and will receive as a reward many fitting stars in his crown."

"I am in the foot hills of the Ozark Mountains, Moselle, Mo.," writes another worker. "My field of labor seems to have no border lines. I am the first resident pastor in this section. Have two churches, preach three times every Lord's day, and often in school houses through the week. Beside this I have stood looking on. I read and prayed. The father cheered, the mother comforted, and those children who had never been to Sunday School were found in my school the next Sunday. The oldest son came to me and said, 'I want to be a Christian.' As my mother went among the hills of Galilee, I want to go among the hills doing good. Pray for my field, and that I may be filled with the Spirit's power for service."

Working in Chinese Villages

Allen N. Cameron, one of the Institute students, is now in China. He has secured type and press, and is printing tracts in Chinese for widespread circulation. In a recent letter he says he has four sermons by Mr. Moody which he proposes to reprint, and continues: "I spent some weeks in the Province of Hunan last fall, and sold 2,222 Gospels, Acts, and Genesis, and gave away some fifteen thousand free tracts, besides speaking, singing, etc. I visited walled cities and twenty-five villages. Hunan, with fifteen million population, has only five missionaries. My Christian cook and I spent eight days in Hur capital, Changaha Fu, and got out safely after selling 615 books. Had four soldiers' escort daily, but no mobs or Oh, how urgently help is needed here every province."

The Gospel in the Michigan Forest

A. Bental, a Moody student of 1897, writing from Sherman, Mich., says: "I will give you a report of last Sunday's work. Preached in Sherman at 10 (I am my own sexton), took charge of Sunday School and taught Bible class. Had then a hurried lunch and mounted my horse (a missionary horse for which a friend sent harness last week), and traveled nine miles to a school house. There is no village near, but I had from five to fifty people every Sunday afternoon. The nearest house is half a mile away. They are much interested, and before the close of summer we hope to have the church, which has been defunct for years, reorganized. All through last winter I was there, often when drifts were so high that we were in constant danger. Once we were lost in the woods, but never have we failed to go, rain or shine."

Laboring for Souls in India

Andrew Johnson, another Moody student, writing from Pochora, Khandesh, says: "Within the last six months the Lord has enabled me to hold 110 street meetings in eighty-five towns and villages, to audiences of, perhaps, thirty-five or forty, and if the Lord continues to give me strength, I hope to be able to visit the rest of the towns, about eighty more, belonging to this station before the hot weather sets in. To my knowledge I am the only missionary in the whole Khandesh district that is doing itinerant preaching this year, and as there are seventeen counties like Pochora in the district, you see there is plenty of room for more itinerant work. I believe God wants a host of men in India, China and Africa at present to fill up the gaps—men who know God and his Book, and are willing to plod a lifetime of need be, unnoticed, and perhaps unappreciated, except by the Master himself, and his smile from day to day."

World-Wide Influence

Our illustrations on these two pages will afford the reader some idea of the Institute and its doings, but a full understanding of the extent of the work carried on there, and of the practical methods employed to equip the great army of spiritual workers who are training there, nothing short of a visit to the Institute can suffice. During each year, eminent divines and teachers from many lands visit the Institute and speak to the students. The influence of this great training school is felt to the far ends of the globe, for its workers and its publications are found wellnigh everywhere. Any reader wishing to know more concerning the Institute should write to Mr. A. P. Fitt, secretary, 80 Institute Place, Chicago, who will reply to all inquiries.

THE BEAUTIFUL MAIN STAIRCASE

Miss Stone's Own Story of Her Work

AMONG BULGARIAN WOMEN AND CHILDREN — A NIGHT WITH ROBBERS IN A TURKISH GUARD-HOUSE

BULGARIAN BIBLE-WOMAN

SINCE her capture focused the world's attention upon her, Miss Stone's past life in Bulgaria and her missionary activities there have acquired a new interest and peculiar significance in the eyes of the public. Through her misfortune, she becomes an international history-maker, commanding regard outside, as well as inside, of religious and missionary circles. What did she do, it is asked, which caused the brigands to show such recognition of her value as capture her and put a price on her head? Below, in her own words, uttered or written in her days of freedom, show her life to have been that of the true, gentle, humble servant of God, doing all good she could to everybody at all times. Incidentally, she is shown to be a very brave and resolute woman. Miss Stone learned to love the country in which she labored, and its people. During her last visit to this country (1896-7) she had much to say before the Woman's Board of Missions in Boston, and other congregations, of the "fair land of Bulgaria," making kindly, brief mention, of its past brave struggles for freedom, its ruler Prince Ferdinand, and his good wife (now deceased), Maria Louisa, telling with pride how Ferdinand had appointed her Court Stationer and Publisher, a young woman educated at the Samaritan Mission station by American women. From that and other schools in Bulgaria where American missionaries, for native girls, she said, had gone forth to exert as Bible women, teachers, musicians, and wives of prominent men, an influence for good on the religious, social and intellectual life of this "fair little land," which had seemed long forgotten of God. She spoke frequently, as she has before and since, often eloquently, of the beautiful lives and devoted labors of American native co-laborers; of her own achievements she has so little to say, that it is difficult to put together the record of her deeds. Rev. Dr. J. F. Burdick, associated for twenty years with Miss Stone in the Bulgarian field, says in a recent pamphlet, when speaking of Salonica, the station which was Miss Stone's headquarters at the time of her capture: "Miss Stone's efficient efforts among the Bible workers, teachers and women in many places has been of great value. Some of her workers are doing more for Christ than many of the teachers. They have been welcomed in Turkish homes." For twenty-three years Miss Stone has had charge of the Bible women's work in Bulgaria. She speaks of that work thus in one of her letters: "Individual workers continue their classes to women who are learning to read, sometimes numbering as many as twenty-six. The children's meetings, with an attendance of from twenty to seventy in different places, together with their temperance meetings, are a power for good. The Bible men teach also in the Sunday Schools, here the twenty, thirty and sometimes forty or more women and girls in one class demonstrate the dearth of laborers here. Then, we have women's prayer-meetings on day evenings; and other prayer services in the churches. She made many long, arduous and dangerous journeys, visiting schools, reading the Scriptures to the women in their own homes and in public meetings, preaching, praying, distributing the Word of God. She relates the following incidents of a Macedonian tour:

In the next village, a bride met us with a close clasp of her hand, and begged us to come to her. . . . In answer, we read the Bible and prayed with a reunited family, and gave the child some pretty Bible-texts in Bulgarian. . . . As we passed through the streets, we met with no idleness. Women and children, sitting at their gates, rose politely and responded cordially to our greeting. This was quite in contrast to the stones with which they formerly pelted any Protestant. . . . At noon-hour, in Kalipote, the women were gathered in their holiday attire, not far from the market-place—some of them representative women of the village. The moments were few, for we were passing travelers. Of what should we speak? One, ruder of speech and coarser of face, began to remark upon the stranger's dress from hat to boots; another rebuked her, saying, "Let us hear what she has to say." The record of the next few moments is in heaven. It was one of those interviews when heart seemed to touch heart. After noontide repast, my heart sent me after those women again. They were waiting, and more in number than before, several of the newcomers being older women—one with white hair glistening under her dark-blue kerchief. They had placed a low stool for me in their midst out of the sun; for this old mother, too, there was a similar seat; the rest were upon the ground.

Only one of her letters gives a clear idea of dangers encountered. It speaks of a tour undertaken in company with Rev. Dr. House and several native workers.

Thursday night we spent in a lonely mountain khan (inn), with a robber on the other side of the fire from us. You may be sure that I heard his planning. I could not sleep. Thankful enough were we when, long before dawn, the khanje (inn-keeper), aroused the robber and sent him on his way, bidding him wait for us along the lonely road. We were a very silent party climbing the mountain, expecting the robber to come upon us anywhere. But as the hours passed, we thanked God for deliverance. . . . Darkness over-bags; it was pleasant to our eyes to read even the label of American flour mills in our own language. . . . After a long walk, we reached the Bulgarian school which I visited two years ago. . . . Last night I had a good talk with my hostess and her sons. They are all very kind to me. May the Lord open their eyes to see that their salvation is from him! . . . We have recovered our horses. God was so merciful! Every one marveled at answer to prayer for horses. Of course, we have been obliged to pay for them some way—about $80, besides expenses of the trip. Pastor Boyardjef never lost hope that we should recover them, and I shall never forget his petition as we stood together in the guard-house that rainy morning, ready for our tramp, that we should find our horses. It was through the Turkish Government that we recovered them; the Turkish Governor was most kind and did all he could to expedite matters.

MISS ELLEN M. STONE

Has this the ring of prophecy? It was very sweet and restful and comforting on Monday to feel that it was the day which you had assigned to me for remembrance before God. Miss Haskell has just told us that to-day is the day appointed for special prayer for our school, and we have given ourselves up to the glad consciousness of help coming—help for us. School has gone on as usual, save that special mention was made at prayers this morning of your praying for us. From four to five, we attended regular meetings at the church. Then we felt that we could not allow the day to pass without at least a half-hour spent at the Master's throne with all those who are praying for us in that far away land of America. So we cut short our study hours this evening, and one of our Bulgarian teachers led us in our service, pointing us to the prevailing power of the prayer of faith, and to the immediate answer in Peter's release, when the Church was gathered together praying. What will not God do in answer to the fervent prayers of his children?

Up to October 28th negotiations for Miss Stone's release were still proceeding. United States Consul General Dickinson, now at Sofia, expresses the hope that the Bulgarian Government, by bringing pressure to bear on the Macedonian Revolutionary Committee, may soon be able to effect Miss Stone's release. Should these efforts fail, the only alternative is to pay the ransom. Mr. Dickinson is said to have secured positive proof that the members of the Macedonian Committee are implicated in the abduction. There were reports current that Madame Tsilka, Miss Stone's companion in captivity, had died, but they cannot be confirmed. The captives are now said to be held at Nevrokup, twenty miles from Melnik, which lies due north of Salonica. Communications have passed between the agents of the brigands at Melnik and Mr. Eddy, the American charge-d'affairs, and Mr. Peet, of the American Board, regarding the ransom, and early results are hoped for.

Miss Mary Haskell, daughter of Rev. Dr. Haskell, of Samar, an American missionary, was the first person to receive any communication from the brigands. Miss Haskell writes:

Into my hands at the dead of night a brigand delivered the only communication received from Miss Stone since her death-like captivity. My father and the whole family had been long asleep, when a bandit bearing a letter knocked repeatedly at my bedroom window. Replying to the question, "What do you want?" the brigand handed a letter through the half-opened window, concealing his face and figure. I urged him for information. He showed me an enormous revolver, saying, "If you look in my face or make any trouble I will blow your brains upon the opposite wall."

He then directed me to give the letter immediately to Dr. Haskell, saying if the contents should be disclosed to any except those mentioned, my father and his family would be put to death. It was addressed to my father. Upon the envelope were the words, "To be delivered at once." I tore open the envelope and found a letter for Treasurer Peet and one for my father, asking him to deliver the letter. I opened the letter because it was a blackmailing epistle, similar to those sent to other members of the mission, demanding that money be placed at certain remote places upon fixed dates under penalty of death. Both letters were in Bulgarian.

THE REAL STORY OF MISS STONE'S ABDUCTION

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is privileged to publish the following from a letter from Mr. Gregory M. Tsilka to friends in this country. He was one of the party whom the brigands attacked:

DEAR MISS RYDER:

SALONICA, TURKEY, Oct. 7, 1901.

On our way from Mrs. Tsilka's home to our work we were surrounded by a large group of armed men, about twenty-five in number, and carried in the forest. After that they took Miss Stone and my wife. They kept the rest of us all night, and in the morning they were gone, having carried with them Miss Stone and Katherine. Pretty nearly one month passed before we got any answer from them, and now they ask $100,000 ransom for both of them. They must be saved soon. So please do something and collect as much help as you can from the nurses and some of their friends and send it by mail to Salonica.

Miss Ryder, please pray for the safety of your friend and my wife.

PRESIDENT OF ROBERT COLLEGE on the ABDUCTION

This letter from President Washburn, just received, states with remarkable clearness the situation in regard to the negotiations for Miss Stone's release:

DEAR DR. TALMAGE:

ROBERT COLLEGE, CONSTANTINOPLE, Oct. 11, 1901.

All Americans here are deeply interested in the fate of Miss Stone, and, for my part, I have been much moved at the outburst of practical sympathy which has been evoked in her behalf. Dealing with brigands in Turkey is a peculiar business, and it is probable that the publicity which has been given to this raising of money will very much increase the difficulties of those who have the matter in hand. You can see that the payment of such a ransom as is demanded would be to offer a premium to brigands all over Turkey to turn their attention to American missionaries, who have heretofore seldom been molested, though three have been killed since I came to Turkey forty-three years ago.

The chief difficulty in the case of Miss Stone has not been to find money, but to find Miss Stone and the brigands. If, as is generally believed, it is a band of political brigands, I do not think that her life is in danger, and when found, she ought to get her liberty without any exorbitant payment. Unhappily, up to the present time, it has been impossible to get any reliable news as to where she is, or who the brigands are who have captured her. The American, Turkish and Bulgarian Governments seem to be doing all that they can. It is a terribly hard case for all concerned; but Miss Stone is a brave Christian and is no doubt meeting this trial as her sisters met theirs in China.

took us upon an unknown road, and we sought shelter in a deserted Turkish guard-house. We tied our horses upon the ground floor, divided our bread with them and got ourselves and our belongings upstairs—all this in the thickest darkness. There must have been robbers secreted somewhere inside. We were aroused by the sound of horses passing out. Mr. Petaschken went down and came back reporting that the door had been opened from within, the heavy stone with which he had barricaded it having been set to one side. Our two best horses were gone. It was hard traveling in the rain, but at last we arrived at Serres, and had such a good time among some of the most hospitable, loving Christian souls I ever met. To-day, we went down through the market, and were interested to find good Bulgarian flour in American

THE REBOUND of VIRTUE or VICE

TEXT--Isa. 40: 22:

It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth

WHILE yet people thought that the world was flat and thousands of years before they found out that it was round, Isaiah, in my text, intimated the shape of it—God sitting upon the circle of the earth. The most beautiful figure in all geometry is the circle. God made the universe on the plan of a circle.

There are in the natural world straight lines, angles, parallelograms, diagonals, quadrangles; but these evidently are not God's favorites. Almost everywhere where you find him geometrizing you find the circle dominant, and if not the circle, then the curve, which is a circle that died young. If it had lived long enough it would have been a full orb, a periphery. An ellipse is a circle pressed only a little too hard at the sides.

Giant's Causeway, in Ireland, shows what God thinks of mathematics. There are over thirty-five thousand columns of rocks—octagonal, hexagonal, pentagonal. These rocks seem to have been made by rule and compass. Every artist has his moulding-room, where he may make fifty shapes; but he chooses one shape as preferable to all others. I will not say that the Giant's Causeway was the world's molding room, but I do say, out of a great many figures, God seems to have selected the circle as the best. "It is he that sitteth on the circle of the earth." The stars in a circle, the moon in a circle, the sun in a circle, the universe in a circle, and the throne of God the centre of that circle.

Appreciation of this would correct the architecture of churches, whose shape is often a defiance of divine suggestion. When men build churches they ought to imitate the idea of the Great Architect, and put the audience in a circle, knowing that the tides of emotion roll more easily that way than in straight lines. Six thousand years ago God flung this world out of his right hand; but he did not throw it out in a straight line, but curvilinear, with a leash of love holding it so as to bring it back again. The world started from his hand pure and Edenic. It has been rolling on through regions of moral ice and distemper. How long it will roll God only knows, but it will in due time make complete circuit and come back to the place where it started—the hand of God—pure and Edenic.

The Scientific Circle

The history of the world goes in a circle. Why is it that the shipping in our day is improving so rapidly? A scientific ship-builder says it is because men are imitating in some respects what the small wits deride, the old model of Noah's ark, not as we see it in old-time pictures, but as it really was according to the account given. Great ships have we now, but where is the ship on the sea to-day that could outstride a deluge in which the heaven and the earth were wrecked, landing all the passengers in safety—two of each kind of living creatures, hundreds of thousands of species?

Pomology will go on with its achievements, until after many centuries the world will have plums and pears equal to the paradisaical. The art of gardening will grow for centuries, and after the Downings and Mitchells of the world have done their best, in the far future the art of gardening will come up to the arborescence of the year 1. If the makers of colored glass go on improving, they may in some centuries be able to make something equal to the east window of York Minster, which was built in the year 1290. We are six centuries behind those artists; but the world must keep on toiling until it shall make the complete circuit and come up to the skill of those very men.

If the world continues to improve in masonry, we shall have after awhile, perhaps after the advance of centuries, mortar equal to that which I saw in the wall of an exhumed English city, built in the time of the Romans, sixteen hundred years ago—that mortar to-day as good as the day in which it was made, having outlasted the brick and the stone. I say, after hundreds of years masonry may advance to that point.

If the world stands long enough, we may have a city as large as they had in old times. Babylon, five times the size of London. You go into the potteries of England, and you find them making cups and vases after the style of the cups and vases exhumed from Pompeii. The world is not going back. Oh, no! But it is swinging in a circle, and will come around to the styles of pottery known so long ago as the days of Pompeii. The world must keep on progressing until it makes the complete circuit. The curve is in the right direction, the curve will keep on until it becomes the circle.

Well, now, what is true in the material universe is true in God's moral government and spiritual arrangement. That is the meaning of Ezekiel's wheel. All commentators agree in saying that the wheel means God's providence. But a wheel is of no use unless it turns, and if it turn it turns around, and if it turns around it moves in a circle. What then? Are we parts of a great iron machine whirled around whether we will or not, the victims of inexorable fate? No! So far from that, I shall show you that we ourselves start the circle of good or bad actions, and that it will surely come around again to us unless by divine intervention it be hindered. Those bad or good actions may make the circuit of many years, but come back to us they will as certainly as that God sits on the circle of the earth.

Jezebel, the worst woman of the Bible—Shakespeare copying his "Lady Macbeth" from her picture—slew Naboth because she wanted his vineyard. While the dogs were eating the body of Naboth, Elijah the prophet put down his compass, and marked a circle from those dogs clear around to the dogs that should eat the body of Jezebel, the murderess. "Impossible!" the people said. "That will never happen." Who is that being flung out of the palace window? Jezebel. A few hours after they came around, hoping to bury her. They find only the palms of the hands and the skull. The dogs that devoured Jezebel and the dogs that devoured Naboth. Oh, what a swift, what an awful circuit!

Back to Theocracy

But it is sometimes the case that this circle sweeps through a century, or through many centuries. The world started with a theocracy for government—that is, God was the president and emperor of the world. People got tired of a theocracy. They said: "We don't want God directly interfering with the affairs of the world; give us a monarchy." The world had a monarchy. From a monarchy it is going to have a limited monarchy. After awhile the limited monarchy will be given up, and the republican form of government will be everywhere dominant and recognized. Then the world will get tired of the republican form of government, and it will have an anarchy, which is no government at all. And then, all nations finding out that man is not capable of righteously governing man, will cry out again for theocracy, and say: "Let God come back and conduct the affairs of the world." Every step—monarchy, limited monarchy, republicanism, anarchy—only different steps between the first theocracy and the last theocracy, or segments of the great circle of the earth on which God sits.

But do not become impatient because you cannot see the curve of events, and therefore conclude that God's government is going to break down. History tells us that in the making of the Pyramids it took 2,000 men two years to drag one great stone from the quarry and put it into the Pyramids. If men short-lived can afford to work so slowly as that, cannot God in the building of eternities afford to wait?

What though God should take 10,000 years to draw a circle? Shall we take our little watch, which we have to wind up every night lest it run down, and hold it up beside the clock of eternal ages? If, according to the Bible, a thousand years are in God's sight as one day, then, according to that calculation, the 6,000 years of the world's existence has been only to God as from Monday to Saturday.

Fruit After Many Days

But it is often the case that the rebound is quicker, the return is much quicker than that. The circle is sooner completed. You resolve that you will do what good you can. In one week you put a word of counsel in the heart of a Sabbath School child. During that same week you give a letter of introduction to a young man struggling in business. During the same week you make an exhortation in a prayer-meeting. It is all gone; you will never hear of it perhaps, you think. A few years after a man comes up to you and says, "You don't know me, do you?" You say, "No; I don't remember ever to have seen you." "Why," he says, "I was in the Sabbath School class over which you were the teacher. One Sunday you invited me to Christ; I accepted the offer. You see that church with two towers yonder?" "Yes," you say. He says, "That is where I preach." Or, "Do you see that governor's house? That is where I live."

One day a man comes to you and says, "Good morning." You look at him and say, "Why, you have the advantage of me; I cannot place you." He says, "Don't you remember, thirty years ago, giving a letter of introduction to a young man—a letter of introduction to William E. Dodge?" "Yes, yes, I do." He says, "I am the man; that was my first step toward a fortune; but I have retired from business now, and am giving my time to philanthropies and public interests. Come up to my house and see me."

Or a man comes to you and says, "I want to introduce myself to you. I went into a prayer-meeting so many years ago. I sat back by the door. You arose to make an exhortation. That talk changed the course of my life, and if I ever get to heaven, under God I will owe my salvation to you." In only ten, twenty or thirty years the circle swept out and swept back again to your own grateful heart.

The Circle of Retribution

But sometimes it is a wider circle, and does not turn for a great while. I saw a bill of expenses for burning Latimer and Ridley. The bill of expenses has these items among others:

One load of fire fagots.....	3s. 4d.
Cartage for four loads of wood.....	2s.
Item, a post.....	1s. 4d.
Item, two chains.....	3s. 4d.
Item, two staples.....	6d.
Item, four laborers.....	2s. 8d.

making in all twenty-five shillings and eight pence. That was cheap fire, considering all the circumstance, but it kindled a light which shone all around the world, and aroused the martyr spirit, and out from that burning of Latimer and Ridley rolled the circle wider and wider, starting other circles, convoluting, overrunning, circumscribing, overarching all heaven—a circle.

But what is true of the good is just as true of the bad. You utter a slander against your neighbor, has gone forth from your teeth; it will never come back to you think. You have done the man all the mischief you can. You rejoice to see him wince. You say, "Didn't I give it to him?" That word has gone out, that slanderous word, on its poisonous and blasted way. You think it will never do you any harm. But I am watching that word, and I see it beginning to curve and it curves around, and it is aiming at your head. You had better dodge it. You cannot dodge it. It rolls into your bosom, and after it rolls in a word of an old book rolls in after it, saying, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

You maltreat an aged parent. You begrudge him the room in your house. You are impatient of his whimsicalities and garrulity. It makes you mad to hear him tell the same story twice. You give him food he cannot masticate. You wish he was away. You wonder if he is going to live forever. He will be gone very soon. His steps are shorter and shorter. He is going to stop. But God has an account to settle with you on that subject. After a while your eye will be dim, and your gait will halt, and the sound of the grating will be low, and you will tell the same story twice, and your children will wonder if you will never be taken away. They called you "father" once; now they call you the "old man." If you live a few years longer they will call you the "old chap!" What are those rough words with which your children are accosting you? They are the echo of the very words you used in the ear of your old father forty years ago. What is that which you are trying to chew but find it unmanageable, and your jaws ache and you surrender the attempt? Perhaps it may be the gristle which you gave to your father for his breakfast forty years ago.

A gentleman passing along the avenue saw a son dragging his father into the street by the hair of the head. The gentleman, outraged at this brutal conduct, was about to punish the offender, when the old man arose and said: "Don't hurt him; it's all right; forty years ago this morning I dragged out my father by the hair of his head!" It is a circle. Other sins may be adjourned to the next world, but maltreatment of parents is punished in this world. That circle is made quickly, very quickly. Oh, what a stupendous thought! that the good and the evil we start come back to us. Do you know that the judgment day will be only the points at which the circles join, the good and the bad we have done coming back to us—unless divine intervention hinder—coming back to us with welcome or delight or curse of condemnation?

Culmination of Influence

Oh; I would like to see Paul, the invalid missionary, at the moment when his influence comes to full orb—his influence rolling out through Antioch, through Cyprus, through Lystra, through Corinth, through Athens, through Asia, through Europe, through America, through the first century, through five centuries, through twenty centuries, through earth, through heaven; and at last, the wave of influence, having made full circuit, strikes his soul. Oh, then I would like to see him! No one can tell the wide sweep of the circle of Paul's influence, save the One who is seated on the circle of the earth.

I should not like to see the countenance of Voltaire when his influence comes to full orb. When the fatal hemorrhage seized him at eighty-three years of age, his influence did not cease. The most brilliant man of his

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" IN CHINA

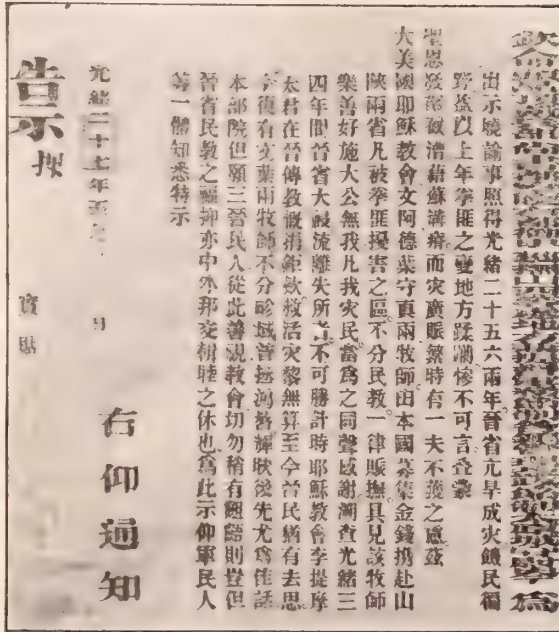

An Official Proclamation by the Governor of Shansi Regarding the Relief Fund

R. E. H. EDWARDS, one of the missionaries who has been prominently associated with Chairman Arthur H. Smith and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Committee in Shansi, a document of unique interest. Dr. Edwards writes:

I would take this opportunity of thanking you and the subscribers to your paper, as also the proprietor, for the relief they have sent for the distressed of this province. As they will have gathered from letters already sent you, the distress in the province of Shensi has been very much worse than that in this province. The contributions sent through your paper have already had some good effect here, especially in drawing a distinction between the Protestants and Roman Catholics. The latter are trying to get all they possibly can out of this poor people, and are consequently increasing the ill-feeling against them. Enclosed is a translation of a proclamation, which has been issued by the Governor of this province concerning THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief money, as also a photograph of the same, which I thought might interest your readers.

The proclamation sent by Dr. Edwards is given herewith, both original and translation.

The proclamation is read from right to left and from top to bottom. The first column contains a list of titles of the Governor with his name. Then follows: "A proclamation issued to make known the following: Be it known that last year and the year before there was great drought in this province, causing much suffering and hunger. Many people were everywhere. Last year the country was devastated by the Boxer rebellion and the misery was beyond words. By the Imperial favor, money was again distributed to arrest the distress and revive the land (like water being let into a barren waste). But the suffering was widespread and those to be relieved many, and the anxiety was great lest one should not obtain relief. Therefore the two American Protestant missionaries, Wen-ah-teh (I. J. Atwood), and Yeh-sheo-chen (Dr. Edwards), brought for the two provinces of Shansi and Shensi money contributed in their country. Everywhere where there had been mischief done by the Boxers, they relieved all according to one rule—not distinguishing between Christians and non-Christians. Let all understand that these missionaries are willing and pleased thus to distribute relief without any idea of gaining merit. All my people who are in distress should with one voice return thanks for this. Previously in the third and fourth years of the present reign there was also great calamity in this province and those wandering about homeless were beyond counting. At that time the Protestant missionary, Li-ti-mo-tai (Rev. Timothy Richard), preached in this province and brought much money, generously contributed, and thus saved alive innumerable people who were in distress. The people of this province should at this time think of that, for now the missionaries Wen and Yeh have come to again save all who are loudly wailing, without distinction of boundaries, and the dawning of the sunshine is the same now as it was then. This is certainly good news! I, the Governor, am anxious that on account of this the people of this province will think well of the religion (church), and not in the least speak evil of it. Thus not only will both non-Christians and Christians of the province be benefited, but also there will be the blessing of friendliness (created) between China and foreign countries.

This proclamation is for the information of officials and people both civil and military. All should be perfectly acquainted with it. Fully acquaint yourselves and notify others. Issued in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of Kwang-hsu, fifth moon. A proclamation with seal. Let it be carefully exhibited everywhere.

Japan's "Grand Old Man" Visits Us

...HOW MARQUIS ITO AND COUNT INOUE BECAME THE FRIENDS OF CHRISTIANITY

See Illustration on First Page...

WHEN Commodore Perry's fleet entered the Bay of Edo, Japan, in 1853, there was an almost unanimous feeling on the part of the Japanese that the "hated foreigners" ought never to be allowed to pollute their sacred soil. The signing of a treaty, however, by the Shogun established commercial relations with other powers, and opened a few ports to their vessels and merchants. Small tracts of land were also granted for residence to European travelers and diplomats.

Still, some of the provinces refused to accept the terms of the treaty, and ten years later, a couple of foreign ships that were attempting to pass through the Straits of Shimonoseki were fired upon. This act of hostility resulted in the sending by other nations of some vessels of war to punish the hostile forces, and open the way for ships to pass the straits without being molested. After the destruction of the earthworks, and the capture of the town, a large indemnity was exacted, and a pledge that no further occurrence of a similar character should take place.

During the conduct of the negotiations, two young Japanese took an active part. They were deeply impressed with the superior equipment and efficiency of the foreign ships, and also of the army and navy. Filled with the desire to find out the secret of the military strength of alien countries, and thus to prepare to cope with them in the future, these two young men left their country secretly, in defiance of the law. They reached London with only one dollar between them, and without a friend to whom they could go for advice or assistance. The providence of God, a report of the arrival of the two Japanese waifs in London reached Mr. Hugh Matheson, a wealthy Christian merchant, who was largely interested in trade in the East. He took them both into his own home, and provided for them in every way that they could desire. They were diligent students and keen observers of all that they saw; but what impressed them especially was the character and nobility of their kind benefactor. Quietly and steadily they were moulded by his influence, and filled with admiration and esteem for his goodness, as well as his greatness. Instead of being foreigners, they grew desirous to promote more intimate relations with other countries, and also to elevate their own people to a similar condition of enlightenment and prosperity.

After two years in England, they returned to Japan to take an active part in the revolution, which brought about the establishment of the rightful sovereign upon the throne and the inauguration of a new and better order of things. Gradually they rose from one grade to another, and in the great changes which took place, new and ever-increasing responsibilities were intrusted to them. In the marvelous transformation which has taken place in Japan, no names have been more prominent or worthy of honor than those of the two young men who were in that Christian home in London the secret of their prosperity and greatness. One of these is now Count Inoue and the other, Marquis Ito, who has been called three times by his sovereign to fill the highest position of service in the Japanese Empire.

These two men with such a history have filled so large an important place in the progress of their country that some of the many examples of God's presence and control of human affairs. The remarkable success of missionary work in Japan has, to a greater extent than is now or probably ever will be known, been due to the influence of that Christian merchant in London on the lives and character of these two men. Neither has ever professed Christianity, yet both have in various and important ways given assistance to the efforts of the missionaries. For one thing, all have special reason for thankfulness, that the old spirit of hatred and opposition has almost utterly passed away, and that complete religious toleration is now the law of the land.

As an example of what Christianity owes to Marquis Ito, I may mention that during the war with China, while he was Prime Minister, the distribution of Scriptures to the army and navy was officially sanctioned, and Christian work in the hospitals was not only allowed but encouraged. It was by his assistance also that a copy of the Bible, especially prepared for that purpose, was presented to the Emperor. About two years ago, a new minister of education issued an edict, particularly intended to exclude all religious teachings from the schools. This was so at variance with the policy which had prevailed when Marquis Ito was at the head of the Cabinet, that a committee called upon him and asked his opinion in regard to the matter. Without hesitation he condemned the measure, and regretted its enactment. Not long after, he was again appointed to the head of the Cabinet, and now Christianity is more free in Japan than ever before.

So God raises up men now, as in days of old, to carry on, in one way and another, the great work of establishing his kingdom among men.

Yokohama, Japan

REV. HENRY LOOMIS.

Marquis Hirobumi Ito is now in this country on a tour around the world. He is accompanied by a distinguished suite. In his American programme, he included a visit to Washington to pay his respects to the President, a trip to the Buffalo Exposition, and a visit to a number of our leading cities. He comes as a private citizen; yet such is the universal appreciation of true greatness of character that Marquis Ito has been feted everywhere. Yale honored him with a degree, and in Chicago, New York and Washington he was the "lion of the hour" during his stay.

century, he had used all his faculties for assaulting Christianity; his bad influence widening through France, widening out through Germany, widening through all Europe, widening through America, widening through the one hundred and twenty-three years that have gone since he died, widening through earth, widening through the great future, until at last, the accumulated influence of his baleful teachings and dissolute life will beat against his dismayed spirit, and at that moment it will be enough to make the black hair of eternal darkness turn white with the horror. No one can tell how that bad man's influence girdled the earth, save the One who is seated on the circle of the earth—the Lord Almighty.

"Well, now," say some, "this, in some respects, is a very glad theory, and in others a very sad one; we would like to have the good we have ever done come back to us, but the thought that all the sins we have ever committed will come back to us fills us with affright." My brother, I have to tell you God can break that circle, and will do so at your call. I can bring twenty passages of Scripture to prove that when God, for Christ's sake, forgives a man, the sins of his past life never come back. The wheel may roll on and on, but you take your position behind the Cross, and the wheel strikes the Cross and is shattered forever. The sins fly off from the circle and fall at right angles with complete oblivion. Forgiven! Forgiven! The meanest thing a man can do is, after some difficulty has been settled, to bring it up again; and God will not do anything like that. God's memory is mighty enough to hold all the events of the ages, but there is one thing that is sure to slip his memory, one thing he is sure to forget, and that is pardoned transgression. How do I know it? I will prove it. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven."

But do not make the mistake of thinking that this doctrine of the circle stops with this life. It rolls on through heaven. You might quote in opposition to me what St. John says about the city of heaven. He says it "lieth four square." That does seem to militate against this idea of a circle; but do you not know there is many a square house that has a family circle facing each other, and in a circle moving, and I can prove that this is so in regard to heaven. St. John says: "I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders." And again he says: "I saw round about the throne four and twenty seats." And again he says: "There was a rainbow round about the throne."

The two former imply a circle; the last, either a circle or a semicircle. The seats facing each other, the angels facing each other, the men facing each other. Heaven an amphitheatre of glory. Circumference of patriarch and prophet and apostle. Circumference of Scotch Covenanters and Theban legion and Albigenes. Circumference of the good of all ages. Periphery of splendor unimagined and indescribable. A circle! A circle!

But every circumference must have a centre, and what is the centre of this heavenly circumference? Christ. His all the glory; his all the praise; his all the crowns. All heaven wreathed into a garland round about him. Take off the imperial sandal from his foot, and behold the scar of the spike. Lift the coronet of dominion from his brow, and see where was the laceration of the briars. Come closer, all heaven, narrow the circle around his great heart. O Christ, the Saviour! O Christ, the man! O Christ, the God! Keep thy throne forever, seated on the circle of the earth, seated on the circle of heaven.

On Christ, the solid rock, I stand;
All other ground is shifting sand.

Let the Truth Prevail

SEVERAL readers have written to us inquiring as to the truth or falsity of certain rumors concerning the China Famine Relief Fund. We do not usually give heed to canards of this class, which are indiscriminately leveled at religious as well as secular work, but in the present instance, as the statements have appeared in a Western newspaper, which credits The China Times as its source of information, we consider it due both to the contributors to the fund and to the members of the Missionary Famine Relief Committee at Tientsin, that these charges should be promptly refuted. We give below the charges themselves, side by side with the reply:

1. That the China Famine Fund has gone into the hands of Chinese officials.

Unfounded. The fund moneys have been remitted direct to the Committee at Tientsin, and the distribution (as shown by the missionaries' letters) has been conducted through them and the native religious auxiliaries, and not through Chinese officials in any instance.

2. That it never reached its destination, and was not applied to the relief of the famine sufferers.

Absolutely unfounded. It was taken to Shansi personally by Rev. E. H. Edwards and I. J. Atwood, and to Shensi by Rev. M. B. Duncan. The Governor of Shansi, in a public proclamation, has thanked the missionaries and their American contributors for the aid thus rendered. That proclamation is published, in Chinese and English, in another part of this issue. It speaks for itself, and is a complete refutation of the charge that the fund went into the hands of Chinese officials. The Governor, referring to Messrs. Atwood and Edwards, distinctly says: "They relieved all, according to one rule, not distinguishing between Christians and non-Christians," an eloquent testimony to the fact of their faithful service and their personal handling of the Fund.

3. That Li Hung Chang devoted funds intended for Shansi relief to the purchase of articles for the royal palace at Peking.

Devoid of the slightest foundation in fact.

4. That Earl Li has virtual possession of the fund.

Equally unfounded and gratuitous. He has never controlled, or attempted to control, the fund or its distribution, either directly or indirectly.

5. That there was no need for the relief movement, as the famine conditions were grossly misrepresented.

This is equivalent to asserting that Li Hung Chang, the missionaries, both American and English, the correspondents of the various Missionary Boards in this country, the American Consuls, the native Christians, and the leading English press throughout China, were all engaged in wilful misrepresentation—a suggestion which is altogether too absurd to be entertained by any sensible person.

6. That China is, and always has been, abundantly able to feed its own hungry.

The Imperial Government's reverses left it greatly crippled financially; and the provincial finances of the famine provinces were also practically exhausted by war, drought and famine. They had provincial and local relief funds, but these proved inadequate. Earl Li knew these facts when he invited American aid for the famine relief.

Incidentally (and to show upon how slight a foundation such charges may rest) it should be explained that the relief fund of Shansi province mentioned by the Shanghai New Press, is a China Provincial Relief Fund, not the fund raised by American contributors and distributed through the Tientsin Famine Relief Committee.

Our Missionary Committee in China consists of the Rev. Arthur H. Smith, Tientsin, chairman, and Irenaeus J. Atwood, M.D., Rev. E. H. Edwards, Rev. H. H. Lowry, Rev. M. B. Duncan, associate members. These gentlemen, on assuming charge of the fund, were, at their own request, granted full authority in all matters relative to apportionment and distribution, they assuming all responsibility. Remittances have been made to this committee exclusively, not one dollar having been distributed through any other channel. That they have fulfilled their commission with scrupulous fidelity we have not the slightest doubt.

Partial accounts of their stewardship have already appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, notably reports of the work of Messrs. Atwood and Edwards (issue Sept. 18, p. 792) and the signed official report of the distribution by the Committee of Shansi Christian churches (see issue Oct. 2, p. 834). And when the full reports are presented they will clearly and conclusively show that the Committee have performed their whole duty in a manner befitting their honored station and sacred calling.

The Chinese Minister's Denial

CHINESE LEGATION, WASHINGTON,) 26th October, 1901.)

Editor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to certain newspaper reports which allege that the money, which was so generously given by the citizens of the United States, and in raising which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD took such a prominent part, for the relief of the famine sufferers in the districts of Shensi, China, went no further than the pockets of Chinese officials, and especially implicating His Excellency Li Hung-Chang.

Will you kindly state for me, through the columns of your paper, that there is no truth whatever in these newspaper reports, and that the whole story is an unmitigated falsehood. It is, as you know, perfectly absurd on the face of it, because the money did not go through any Chinese official's hands. Viceroy Li had nothing to do with the distribution of the money so liberally contributed by Americans, as the distribution was made through agents of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, responsible foreigners residing in China, of whom most, if not all, are, I believe, American missionaries.

By your publishing this letter in your paper, I shall be greatly obliged. Yours very truly, WU TING-FANG.

A Cure-All

IT seems that in the olden time, as well as now, there were naughty people abroad. In seventeen hundred and eighty-eight, Dominie Rubel, of Flatbush, was deposed from the ministry for various irregularities, and went to doctoring the body instead of the soul, and advertised, "It has pleased Almighty God to give me wisdom to find out the universal pill that will cure most diseases."

We are afraid of the descendants of Dominie Rubel, who are attempting with some universal pill to correct the world's disorders. Look out for the quacks in all departments, and the country grocery which has on its shelves patent medicines for the extirpation of all complaints from run-around to catalepsy. A potion that proposes at the same time to rejuvenate liver, spleen, brain, nerves, and cuticle, is a lie on the face of it. A gunner trying to shoot in ten directions at once will hit none of the targets. We believe in specialists. The anatomy of the human ear is enough to employ a man's genius for a lifetime, likewise the eye. He who professes to know everything knows nothing. When you get sick you had better call in a doctor who does not make extravagant pretensions. Beware of the universal pill.

Sometimes a good and talented man will go off on a tangent. He has found out something in the educational, mechanical, or scientific world that will renovate and reconstruct everything. It will make the earth over again. He is crazy to have everybody take it. "Down with this pill," he says, "it is a corrective for everything." But the prescriptions are wofully apt to get mixed.

India's Gift to China

EVEN in the greatest benevolent movements, it is seldom one finds so touching an instance of consecrated sympathy as that which is described in the following letter, from an American missionary in India:

MAZAGON, BOMBAY, September 25.

My dear Dr. Klopsch: I am sending you twenty pounds ($100) for the China Famine Fund. This money has been given by the following:

By Indian Christians who, remembering God's mercy to them in the last famine, desire to help their brethren in China.

By Christian lepers in the asylums at Pui and Poladpur. When these lepers were told of the suffering in China, they expressed a desire to help, and requested that their daily dose of rice be reduced, and the saving sent to China.

By the children rescued in the last famine. Not having money of their own, they have denied themselves certain articles of food, and raised money to save the boys and girls of China.

By the child-widows and girls saved by Pundita Ramabai. By some of the wild people of the hills near Bombay. Having themselves been saved from great distress, they have been touched by the story of China's suffering and gave their mite.

By Hindoos, Mussulmen and Jews, in a mission district south of Bombay, where the Christian pastor used the descriptions given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and met with a ready response from his non-Christian friends.

J. E. ABBOTT

Truly, China's plight has touched India's heart. Nothing could be more beautiful than the spontaneous offerings of these people, who so lately were themselves saved from famine and death. It must make the hearts of generous Americans glow to know that their example of Christian benevolence has borne such blessed fruit.

...An Art Gallery For Every Home

THE premium propositions illustrated on the middle pages of this issue, and to which we specially direct the attention of our readers, cannot fail to commend themselves for their range of variety, high quality and remarkable value. Tens of thousands of families are annually at the holiday season on the lookout for the premium offers submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with a view to utilizing them in connection with their plans for gladdening the hearts on Christmas Day of friends and kindred dear. And never before were such opportunities presented as these to which we now call attention, and, in addition, with whichever proposition you may accept, premium (no premium, or magazine combination, as the case may be) our Art Portfolio, the most phenomenal gift ever made by publisher to subscriber. Twelve superb pictures magnificently executed, each one a veritable gem, all worth hanging, are sent free, all charges prepaid, immediately on receipt of your subscription. Here is something positively unprecedented in the publishing line.

WE do not wish to unduly urge you to send in your subscription as early as possible, but we would suggest that it would be the part of wisdom not to indulge in unnecessary delay, as we expect such an enormous demand for our Art Portfolio that it would not surprise us if we were unable, later on in the season, to meet the demand promptly. During the present month we know that we can meet all requirements, and of course we shall try our best to get enough of these Art Portfolios to go around, at least till New Year's Day. But it is always better to be even a month ahead of time and get what you want, than to be one day too late and miss it.

A Book to Brighten Your Life

MARY LOWE DICKINSON'S remarkable book entitled, Heaven, Home and Happiness, promises to be the most attractive premium ever offered to our readers. It is in demand ahead of any other premium offered, and tens of thousands of households will be brightened, cheered, and benefited by the presence of this volume. There is in it which appeals alike to the hearts of the aged, the middle-aged, and the young. It matters little whether you are rich or poor, or what your condition in life may be, Heaven, Home and Happiness will brighten many an hour of your life, and will endear itself to all who read it.

The Bible for All Christendom

OUR Red Letter Bible is the greatest innovation in Bible publication since the days of the Revision. It is so necessary here to dwell on its remarkable features that they are fully explained on pages 938 and 939. It is a great work. It invests the Bible with a new interest, even to those who have made it the "man of their counsel and the light of their path" since their childhood days. No matter how many Bibles you may have, the Red Letter Bible, sooner or later, will find its way into your home because it will impress itself upon you as a necessity without which there will be always something wanting.

Our Attractive Magazine Combinations

THEN, there are the magazine combinations, affording the advantages of reading in other directions at about half the usual price, or even less. We may say, without fear of contradiction, that no combinations elsewhere presented can compare with those we offer. Indeed, the best interests of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family are always loyally and conscientiously considered and advanced by the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and its enormous subscription list—over 280,000 a week—evidences the hearty appreciation of our efforts on the part of all lovers of pure, bright, elevating and helpful literature.

Please remember that our Art Portfolio goes with every subscription, and that its twelve large, beautiful pictures will contribute to gladden twelve hearts on Christmas Day, brighten your own home for many years to come. Promptly. Do it to-day.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

International Courtesies

FUNERAL ceremonies of a very significant character were witnessed on October 19, at Lundy's Lane Cemetery, on the Canadian side of Niagara Falls. A short time before, while some excavations were being made in the cemetery, nine skeletons were found of bodies evidently hastily buried. Near them were the tattered fragments of uniforms, on which were some buttons much corroded. An examination of the buttons, however, showed that the uniforms had been worn by soldiers of the Ninth Regiment of United States Infantry. Evidently the skeletons were American soldiers who had fallen in the battle of Lundy's Lane, which was fought on July 25, 1814. They must have been interred in a common grave, which, being marked, had remained unknown for eighty-seven years. The Canadian authorities decided to give them the honorable burial. It was at first proposed to move them up to the United States, but after consultation with our officers, it was deemed more appropriate to let them lie in the soil on which they had fought and died. The Dominion Government granted permission to United States troops to enter the country carrying arms, and accordingly, Company K of the Fourth Regiment of Infantry, crossed the border to pay the last tribute to their dead comrades in arms. An escort of British troops met them on the bridge and together they marched to the cemetery where they gave the remains military burial. After the ceremony the American soldiers attended the unveiling of a monument to Queen Victoria, which has been erected near the scene of the battle. It was a significant spectacle—that of the soldiers of the two nations joining cheers for King Edward and President Roosevelt, within sight of the cemetery where the American and British dead repose side by side. If the spirits of these departed enemies were looking on, with the light of eternity upon them, they, too, would rejoice that the promise has been fulfilled:

They shall give peace in the land, and shall lie down, and none shall be afraid, neither shall they go through your land (Lev. 25).

The Earth Burning

A singular spectacle is witnessed near Gaston, Ind. A portion north of that town has caught fire, and the soil of about eighty acres is burning fiercely. It was formerly a swamp, but was drained only this year, and is now quite dry. Decayed vegetable matter accumulating during many ages has made a deposit many feet in thickness. A small fire was made there for the burning of refuse, and after a short time it was noticed that it was burning downwards. Gradually the fire spread, and though water in large quantities was thrown upon it, the flames smoldered and broke out in new places. It spread under the surface, sending forth a great quantity of dense smoke. Attempts have been made to smother it by ploughing, but without success, and the laborers were nearly suffocated by the smoke. The soil burns like coal, and it furnishes excellent fuel for the fire. Unless a heavy rain should fall, there is little hope of its being extinguished until the whole layer, which is of unknown depth, is consumed. Such a phenomenon shows that there is no intrinsic probability in the prophecies of the ultimate fate of the whole world.

The elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also and works that are therein shall be burnt up (II. Peter 3: 10).

Studio Romance

A New York artist who is setting out for a several months' sojourn in Germany, tells a remarkable story of a nobleman whose guest he will be there. Nearly two years ago, a tall man of fine presence entered his studio and asked where he could earn a few dollars working as a model. The artist engaged him, and afterwards recommended him to other artists, who employed him. The model was evidently very poor, and was not in good health. Missing him for some days, the artist sent for him, and learned that he was very ill. He went to see him, and finding that his illness was likely to be a long one, obtained admission for him to a sanitarium. The artist was away from the city for some months, and when he returned, went at once to seek his model, but he could find no trace of him. Recently, however, he received a letter from him in Germany, saying that by the death of his father and elder brother, the latter of whom had been accidentally shot, he had fallen heir to the title and vast estates of one of the princely families of Germany. He said that the artist's kindness to him had undoubtedly saved his life, and he begged him to pay him a long visit. The artist has accepted, and he will doubtless receive a warm welcome. All men are not so grateful for kindness rendered. Those whom Christ saves and who through him will inherit eternal riches, do not always show the gratitude to him that he deserves at their hands.

Albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides (Philemon 19).

Saved from Drowning

There was a strange rescue from drowning in Central Park, New York, a few days ago. A number of children had gathered around the Conservatory pond watching the miniature yachts, when a little girl about ten years old overbalanced, and fell in. The child did not know that the water is not deep. Instead of standing up, she struggled, and, in some way, managed to the system, but they declare that they proceed on the known fact that the earth is a huge reservoir of electricity, and that no wire is necessary where there are instruments capable of directing and receiving the current. The character of the instruments used is at present a secret. If, as would appear, the earth itself is a conductor and wires can be dispensed with, the whole electric system will be revolutionized. Thus in a new sense the words of the Psalmist will be fulfilled:

Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world (Ps. 19: 4).

Over the Falls in a Barrel

Such fame as comes through useless deeds of daring has been won by a woman at Niagara. On October 24 she entered a barrel specially constructed to resist pressure and hard blows, and weighted at the foot with lead to keep it upright. Straps were fixed to the bottom, passing over the woman's shoulders; and over her head was a pillow to prevent her being hurt by being flung against the top of the barrel. The barrel was towed out to the middle of the stream, about a mile from the falls, by two boatmen and set adrift. It kept an upright position and passed over the brink at a point on the Canadian side about two hundred feet from the curve of the horseshoe. It was lost sight of for a few minutes and was then seen floating near the rocks on the Canadian shore. Ropes were thrown out and the barrel caught and drawn in. Fifty minutes had elapsed from the time the barrel was set adrift. When it was opened it was found to be about one-third filled with water. The occupant has escaped with no injury but a contusion on the side of the head, and she was able to walk to the hotel. She admitted, however, that the nervous strain had been awful, and declared that a million dollars would not tempt her to repeat the journey. It is strange that anyone should wilfully put life in peril for the mere glory of doing some useless thing that has never been done before. How infinitely higher is the glory, to which comparatively few aspire, of risking life in the service of God!

They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible (I. Cor. 9: 25).

BRIEF NOTES

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has fitted up a house in New York as a club for his large Bible class. No expense has been spared in making it in every way homelike and helpful to the young men.

Two new Baptist pastors are beginning work in famous churches in New York this fall. Dr. A. P. Johnston, formerly of St. Louis, Mo., is already installed in the Fifth Avenue Church, and Dr. George C. Lorimer, of Boston, Mass., is coming to the Madison Avenue Church.

Australia has proportionately more churches than any other country, the number being 6,013, or 210 to every 100,000 people. England has 144 churches to every 100,000 people; Russia only 55 to the same number.

According to the census of last year, the Chinese in this country have decreased from 107,475 a decade since to 89,800, and in California alone from 72,472 to 45,753. But during the same period the Japanese have increased from 2,039 to 24,300, and in the Hawaiian Islands from 13,120 to 61,111.

The Social Settlement idea is being applied with success by Berea College, Ky. Miss Adelia Fox has established a house in a mountain district known as Narrow Gap and is doing an excellent work. Sewing school, singing school and other activities are much appreciated by the people.

Marquis Ito, of Japan, who recently visited this country, said to a fellow traveler that the missionaries were doing a good work, and he wished there were more of them in Japan. It was due to his promise of assistance that a Bible was prepared by the three Bible Societies and through him presented to the Emperor.

The recent report of the Moravian Church shows that it has 478 missionaries in the field. The total number of souls under the care of the missionaries is 96,877, an increase of 1,453 during the year, twenty missionaries have been called into the service during the year; ten have retired from service, and three have died.

The monastic societies of France, against which the recent act was passed, were largely engaged in the wine and spirit trade. M. Clemenceau says that 2,500 establishments were in some kind of trade. Five sold wine wholesale; six, liquor; two, alcohol; four, all kinds of intoxicating liquor retail; seven held licenses as distilleries and nine as inns.

According to reports received by the British Consul-General at Shanghai, Mr. Warren, 900,000 persons in An-Hui province and 300,000 in Kiang-Su province are starving. The famine in these districts is spreading. Available funds are inadequate. Chinese and foreigners are contributing, and a Committee of Consuls has been formed to assist the sufferers.

AMERICAN AND BRITISH TROOPS IN CANADA ON OCT. 19, AT THE FUNERAL OF THE HEROES OF 1814

keep her head under water. Before the policeman could get to her, a boy, seemingly about fourteen years of age, and very well dressed, jumped into the pond and carried the girl to safety. She was trying to save herself, and would probably have lost her life in doing so if no one had been at hand to save her. There are many people who lose their souls in that way. When they realize that they are in real danger, they try to reform or to earn salvation, instead of yielding themselves to Christ, who is able to save them.

To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness (Rom. 4: 5).

Wireless Telegraphy

An astonishing exhibition of wireless telegraphy was given a few days ago. Not only were all the results of the telegraph and telephone achieved without wires, but power was applied. On a small lake was a miniature vessel anchored. The spectators were invited to map out a course, and they did so marking a tortuous route. The anchor was taken up and immediately the vessel started. A man, in a shed on the shore, directed the course of the vessel by the wireless apparatus, following exactly the marking on the map that had been supplied to him. The vessel was at some points of its course more than five hundred yards distant from the shed in which the operator was. Conversations by telephone and by the Morse alphabet were held between two sheds 500 yards apart, between which there was no wire. The inventors do not attempt to explain

Our Correspondent in Persia Describes Peculiar Phases of Life in that Country

IN a recent letter from Miss Hannah Yoseph, our correspondent in Persia (which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), she told of her travels in remote parts of the Persian Empire and of a visit to the young bride of a powerful native chief.

In the letter below, her interesting story of her visit to attend the wedding of Moshbahy Dwan is continued.

URMI, PERSIA, Sept. 13.

We were speaking of the crucifixion. Fatima Hanim (Lady Fatima) the stepmother of Moshbahy Dwan, said, "Koran teaches us that Hezrat Issa (Lord Jesus) when he was carried to be crucified, God, in Christ's stead, made some one else to look like him, and so Christ himself escaped unrecognized, and therefore was neither crucified nor died: the young man, Judas Iscariot, was crucified instead of Christ." "Tourat and Injil," I said, "teach us that through his crucifixion, death and resurrection, we will be saved. Many hundred years before the time of Issa, prophets, the same prophets whom you believe, like Moses, David, Abraham, Isaiah, etc., told of this Saviour. You profess that you do believe in Injil and Tourat; if you really do believe in them you will have to believe in their words too."

"Fatima Hanim, your words are very good; but we are not taught so." She continued, saying that about sixty or seventy years ago, "the king or his princes used to exact so many beautiful girls from each Christian village, and so soon as the poor Christians heard about such command, the elders of each village gathered together all the girls about the age of twelve, and they did what at that time was called Kiz Yazan (writing of fish), that is: The elders put down the names of the marriageable girls and the boys, and then threw lots, and any name that fell to any boy he would have that girl, and when the king's men would come, all would be married, and there would be left no girl to spare."

"Well," I said, "I am very thankful that those evil times have passed away, and hope they will never come again."

Next day we came to Kalajokh, and Hagi Vazir's daughter-in-law kept me over night. She seemed to be a very religious woman. I had seen many Mohammedans pray, and during the Nakuts (intervals between the different parts of their prayer when they are allowed to talk), but this woman at this time was reading from a book and meditating. After her prayer she asked me if we Christians pray. I explained to her how we are taught to pray, and I prayed with her, and when I got through she said to one of her maids, "Our prayers are nothing. I cannot put my mind upon what I am saying. This morning, when I was praying, I heard you talking, and I said to myself, 'I wonder what she

My pictures were again brought out, and on seeing the picture of Moses, she said, "Moossah Paykamar (Moses the Prophet) was partly dumb, because his tongue was burned. Some one said to Pharaoh," continued, "From among the children of Israel a prophet will arise who will take away thy riches from thee," and Pharaoh commanded that every baby among the Israelites should be put to death, and the mother of Moses hid him in a box, and, after sealing it, threw it in the sea, and the box was found and brought to Assiah (Pharaoh's wife), and she, being childless, kept it. One day, while the king, he took hold of the king's beard and pulled the string of the jewels that ornamented him, and the king said to Assiah, his wife, "This child is that prophet, and he must be immediately killed." But she said, "Let them first bring two bowls, one filled with live coals, and the other filled with jewels. If the child puts out his hand and takes hold of jewels, he is the prophet, and you must kill him; but if he takes hold of coals, he is not the prophet." Accordingly the bowls of jewels and live coals were brought in, and the child Moses stretched his hand and wanted to grasp the jewels, when God immediately sent his angel Gabriel and turned the hand toward the live coals and filled his hand with the live coals and carried it to his mouth and burned his tongue, and made him almost dumb.

"Our religion," she continued, "is very good, except that our men marry so many wives, and make us miserable. My husband has gone away to Tabriz to take a fresh wife to himself, and only child, my son and myself, have been put away from the house to make room for her. I have been married to the father of my son nearly twenty years and he has married many times. Some of the women have been kept a few days, some a few months, others not over a year, and our moolah (priest) says we are not to speak a word. Even malaka (angel) cannot hear what we hear and suffer day by day.

Sin, as well as disease, will swallow up the nation. This is certain, that no nation on earth will ever increase or prosper anything when that nation does so deliberately break and transgress the law of God and nature."

HANNAH YOSEPH JACOB.

Our correspondent writes us that she has left Maragha and gone to continue her work as medical missionary at the city of Urm. She has recently been united in marriage to a young Nestorian,

Our Marvelous Art Portfolio

IT is Quite Impossible to Convey in words to the Readers of The Christian Herald an Adequate Idea of the Beauty and Value of our great Art Portfolio. One Lady who saw the Twelve Pictures it Contains said that she Could Not Duplicate these Pictures in her own Town at anything short of $6. But Even That does not do Full Justice to them.

The Fact is, that Nothing like our Art Portfolio has ever Before been Offered as a Premium. Thousands upon Thousands of the Finest Art Productions Contributed by America, England, Germany, France and Italy had been Thoroughly and Carefully Considered, Before the Choice of these Twelve Masterpieces was Decided upon.

Just think of Twelve Beautiful Separate Pictures, Unmounted, each 9 x 12 inches, without Margin,—offered Free as a Premium, with a yearly Subscription to the Brightest and Best Family Paper in the World; Altogether for only $1.50. It seems Incredible, but it is nevertheless true. How we can do it is our Secret, you get the Benefit.

Christmas time is coming. It will be here before you are fully aware of the fact. These Twelve Pictures will make Twelve of the Finest Christmas Presents one can think of, or they will Adorn the walls of your own home for many years to come.

The Art Engravers and Printers are producing for us, under contract, a Limited number, simply because it is impossible to produce all we shall require. To get a set of these Famous and Beautiful Masterpieces, you must Act at Once, or you may be disappointed. But remember, that if you are too late your money is Immediately Refunded, or if you are not altogether satisfied—in fact more than pleased—your Money will be Returned and No Questions Asked. We don't Require Any Explanation—just say the word and your Money Goes Back Immediately—and this applies to all our Premiums.

If ever a Bargain was offered This is One. We feel Proud of our Achievement in this line, and when you get one of these Art Portfolios you will Congratulate Yourself upon your Good Fortune. We know what we are saying, and you will Appreciate it when you get the Portfolio; You Never got Equal Value for the Money.

The Art Portfolio goes free, as a Gift from the Publisher, with Every Subscription, whether it be with or without premium—on a Magazine Combination Subscription—All Get It. This is our Greatest Effort to give The Christian Herald the largest circulation in the world for a Weekly Publication (issued 52 times a year), and we are making a Special Sacrifice to bring about this Result.

Understandest Thou What Thou Readest?

IF there is a Volume in all the World which should be Read Intelligently and Understandingly, it is the Bible—the Book of books—that Heaven-Inspired Volume which is the Foundation and the Corner-stone of our Glorious Faith. Yet no other Volume is so Rich in Important Allusions and References which Require Intelligent Elucidation. Even the Illustrious Eunuch, when Philip questioned him pointedly, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" was forced to confess: "How can I, except some man should guide me?"

Smith-Peloubet's Bible Dictionary will be Found one of the most Helpful Aids to the Intelligent Understanding of the Sacred Text. It is an Indispensable Work, which should be the Companion Volume to the Bible in Every Household.

This Matchless Work contains 811 pages, is bound in Two Styles, Cloth, Plain edges; and Flexible American Levant with Red under Gold Edges.

FOR The Christian Herald every week for One Year—52 Times—and the Smith-Peloubet Bible Dictionary in Cloth and Plain Edges, all Charges Fully Prepaid. Send us $2.00

For the Smith-Peloubet Dictionary in Flexible Leather Binding and Genuine Gold Stamp, with Red Under Gold Edges and Bookmark, together with The Christian Herald for One Whole Year—Every Wednesday—52 Times—Send us $3.00

If you can Afford it, send $3.00 for The Christian Herald and the Bible Dictionary Bound in Flexible Leather. If you cannot afford to Send $3.00, send $2.00 for The Christian Herald and the Bible Dictionary Bound in Cloth.

The Red Letter New Testament

EVERY WORD SPOKEN BY OUR LORD PRINTED IN RED

St. John 21

12 Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine. And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord.

13 Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise.

14 This is now the third time that Jesus showed himself to his disciples, after that he was risen from the dead.

15 ¶ So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs.

16 He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep.

17 He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep.

18 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.

19 This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me.

20 Then Peter, turning about, seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved following; which also leaned on his breast at supper, and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee?

21 Peter seeing him saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do?

22 Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me.

23 Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?

24 This is the disciple which testified of these things, and wrote these things: and we know that his testimony is true.

25 And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen.

The Acts of the Apostles

Chapter 1

THE former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach,

2 Until the day in which he was taken up, after that he through the Holy Ghost had given commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen:

3 To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God:

4 And, being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me.

5 For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence.

6 When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?

7 And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

8 But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

9 And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight.

10 And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel;

11 Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath day's journey.

13 And when they were come in, they went up into an upper room, where abode both Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, Philip, and Thomas, Bartholomew, and Matthew, James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James.

ACTUAL SIZE OF TYPE AND BOOK

ACTUAL STYLE OF BINDING

The High Speed Required to Print this Circular on time may affect the alignment of the Red Lettering. Such, however, is Not the Case with the Book itself.

No Book Like it Has Ever Been Produced

NOTHING like this book has ever before been produced.

The arrangement originated with Dr. Louis Klopsch, Proprietor THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who spent four months in its careful preparation. It is absolutely free from typographical imperfections of any kind, and is in the highest sense of the word a Veritable Gem. The type is very large and very clear, and every word recorded as having been spoken by our Lord is printed in Red. For real convenience, legibility and serviceableness, it is unsurpassed.

It is beautifully bound in American Levant, soft and flexible, with overlapping edges, Red under Gold, and the Only Testament in the World with a Thumb Index. Wherever a Testament can be utilized this Book will be found more acceptable than any other.

For Home Reading, for pocket use, for Church and Sunday School work, it is the Ideal Testament.

This Testament will be Sent, all Charges Prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, on receipt of only $1.85.

The Red Letter New Testament cannot be procured elsewhere. It is fully protected by copyright, and is the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Our Great Art Portfolio

This superb work—absolutely unequalled in its line—and containing 12 excellently executed Art subjects, each measuring, without margin, 9 x 12 inches, Separate and unmounted, and representing the very cream of thousands of the most notable art works of all nationalities, is sent FREE, with the compliments of the Publisher, to every subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether with or without Premium. Money refunded if stock should be exhausted when your order is received. Act to-day—to-morrow may be too late.

Explanatory

THIS EDITION of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, Self-pronouncing and unchanged save for the variation of color in the type. Two colors (red and black) are employed, in accordance with the following simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch:

1 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Lord and Saviour are printed in red.

2 In the Old Testament, the passages printed in red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which He referred.

3 Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.

4 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ.

No Other Bible

LIKE UNTO THIS!

Here the actual words, quotations, references and allusions of Christ, not separated from their context, nor in a fragmentary or disconnected form, but in their own proper place, as an integral part of the Sacred Record, stand out vividly conspicuous in the distinction of color. The plan also possesses the advantage of showing how frequently and how extensively, on the authority of Christ himself, the authenticity of the Old Testament is confirmed, thus greatly facilitating comparison and verification, and enabling the student to trace the connection between the Old and the New, link by link, passage by passage.

This, the ONLY RED LETTER BIBLE in the World, Divinity Circuit, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Brightest and Best Weekly Family Paper

THE RED LETTER BIBLE is an innovation that will be hailed with delight by all who enjoy Bible Reading. In the New Testament Every Allusion, Reference and Quotation made by Him are PRINTED IN RED. In the Old Testament, all references to our Lord's Word are PRINTED IN RED. Our Bibles are he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand.

11 He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities.

12 Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors.

Chapter 54

The prophet, for the comfort of the Gentiles, prophesieth the amplitude of their church, their certain deliverance out of affliction, and their sure preservation.

SING, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child: for more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife, saith the LORD.

2 Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes;

3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.

4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.

5 For thy Maker is thine husband; the LORD of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel; The God of the whole earth shall he be called.

6 For the LORD hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God.

7 For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee.

8 In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with Israel assured of God's unchanging love everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the LORD thy Redeemer.

9 For this is as the waters of life unto me: for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should not go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee.

10 For the mountains shall be removed, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of peace be removed, saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee.

11 O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundation with sapphires.

12 And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones.

13 And all thy children shall be taught of the LORD; and thou shalt be the peace of thy children.

14 In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be feared without oppression; for thou shalt not fear: and from terror; for it shall not come near thee.

15 Behold, they shall surely come together, but not by me: who ever shall gather together against thee, shall fall for thy sake.

16 Behold, I have created the smith, that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy.

17 No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt overcome. This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD, and their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.

Chapter 55

The prophet, with the promises of Christ, faith, and to repentance. The happy state of them that believe.

HO, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and that hath no money; come ye, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.

Letter Bible—Read the Description

Teachers' Bible

Contains the CONCORDANCE, Subject-Index, Persons, Places and Things, Gazetteer, and Dictionary, all under ONE Alphabetical Arrangement, together with Helps and Maps.

In the Red Letter Bible, more clearly than in any other edition of the Holy Scriptures, it becomes plain that, from beginning to end, the central figure upon which all lines of law, history, poetry and prophecy converge is Jesus Christ the Saviour of the world. It sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfilment of the promise of all the ages.

Our Book-Mark Index

Is made of CELLULOID attached to Purple Ribbon, and contains, in Alphabetical Arrangement, all the Books of the Bible, thus enabling anyone to instantly find the particular book wanted. It is the exclusive property of The Christian Herald.

WITH THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOR ONE YEAR—52 TIMES—FOR ONLY TWO DOLLARS

No volume issued during the past ten years can compare in richness, variety, wealth of sentiment and intrinsic worth with that just produced for us exclusively by Mary Lowe Dickinson, under the title of "Heaven, Home and Happiness." From cover to cover it abounds in the choicest contributions of all nationalities and all ages, on subjects that have ever been, above all others, of the intensest interest to the children of men.

Mrs. Dickinson knows, probably better than any other author, just how to touch the human heart, and in this work she appears at her very best. Men, women and children will find this book one of rare attractiveness, and none can read it without edification and profit. Open it where you will, every page will captivate and charm even the casual reader.

"Heaven, Home and Happiness" will fill many a winter's evening with a delightful charm that will be recalled with genuine pleasure in years to come. "Of the making of many books there is no end," but such books as this are among the exceptions, and many a year may pass before one can find its equal. Dr. Talmage's introduction is, as usual, characteristic of the genial clergyman, whose name is a household word the world over.

"Heaven, Home and Happiness" contains numerous beautiful illustrations, many of which have never been published in this country. It is excellently printed on heavy, highly-finished paper, and superbly bound in rich cloth, with an emblematic cover. It will indeed prove an ornament to any and every home.

It contains 416 Pages, embellished with Numerous Beautiful Pictures, Superbly Printed on extra fine paper, and artistically bound in Rich Vellum Cloth. Its weight is about three pounds. It is sent, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the brightest and best family weekly in the world, for one year—52 times—on receipt of only $2.00.

The Cheapest and the Best

THE tendency of the times is to read up in all proper directions, and by means of current publications to keep posted as to what is going on in this great world of ours. Hence, many families now require more than one periodical. To meet this demand, we here submit Combination Propositions, which enable subscribers to enjoy Three or Four Papers at about the Price of Two. "The Christian Herald," as in former years, has perfected Arrangements with other Publishers, enabling us to offer these Combinations, which will be found, Financially and otherwise, Far More Attractive than Any Offered Elsewhere. We are the Pioneers.

Choosing the Right Magazine

HOW to make the Proper Selection from so many Standard High-Class Publications is not an easy matter, and a few Suggestions may, perhaps, prove quite Acceptable.

If a Pastor should wish to Select what would prove most Helpful to him, he will no doubt Choose "Current Anecdotes," "Current History" and "Record of Christian Work"—which, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—altogether worth $5.50, would only require $3.00. Portfolio included in every Combination.

A Sunday School Worker would make the same Selection at the same Expense, substituting, however, "The Sunday School Times" for some one of the others.

In order to keep Abreast with the Times, select "Current History" and "Success," which, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, although worth $4.00, would involve an outlay of only $2.50.

A Family would select "Everybody's" (or some other Magazine), "Harper's Bazar" (or "Woman's Home Companion"), "The American Boy" (or "Little Folks"), which, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, would incur an Expense of $3.00.

Then there are the "Cosmopolitan Magazine," and "Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly" as a substitute for any other, either of which will be found very Acceptable. Portfolio always included.

Remember, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Must Form a Part of Each Combination

A Homesick Heart

NAOMI." The old man did not look up from the money he was counting, and arranging before him in gleaming piles; there was the chink of coins pressing against one another, as he laid them carefully together, and the light that streamed through the casement fell on his thin, wiry, white hands and the yellow gold.

"Yes, father," said the young girl, not turning her head. Her eyes, wistful and sad, had a far-away look. He was longing for home, longing for a sight of Spain, where she had spent her childhood, and, away from which, she was pining like a transplanted flower.

"It will take money, much money, my child, to go back, but I have it, and I will take our passage to-morrow. We are but pilgrims and strangers here, and what matters it where we tarry? If you cannot be well and content anywhere else, you shall again go to your mother's country, though I can find only an empty house here, and a grave covered with myrtles where my Hilda sleeps."

The girl by the window did not move, but over her face flashed a sudden swift color, a blush that came and went quickly, and her eyes shone. Her face was transfigured. Her father felt the brightness, though he did not see it.

"Homesickness is a curse for youth," he said, gently, "and, Naomi, you will see Lorenzo again. Lorenzo has written. He is doing well. Three years ago I was of another mind, for you were both children, but now, if Lorenzo and you will love one another, I will not say No. We have but one life to live, and, for some natures, one is enough. And, East or West, Naomi, home is best."

They talked long that day, when the glittering gold was put back in the chest. Naomi sat in her father's lap, and put her arms about his neck. And, he thought, how much she grew like her mother. Signor Ferrano was a scholar and a philosopher; he was also, tenderly, deteriorating and becoming too fond of money. The lust of hoarding was eating in his heart. From this awful greed, he had been roughly startled by the chance word of a doctor, an old friend and countryman, who, recently visiting him, had touched Naomi keenly. "Ferrano," the man had said, "take Naomi home, or you will lose her. She will go where her mother did, unless you can restore her by the use of a great joy."

The physician was wise. Ah, to how many of us would the tonic of a great joy prove the most wonder-restorative in the world. Blessed are they who have in their power to discover this sovereign remedy. Naomi's father cared for gold, but he cared more for his daughter than for his treasure, after all; and the day went home to begin a new epoch in their lives, where Lorenzo was waiting for his bride.

Our Own Way

To have each day the thing I wish,
Lord, that seems best to me;
But not to have the thing I wish,
Lord, that seems best to thee.

Very early in life, we see the baby striving to have its own way, and as we go on in the course of our careers, if we are candid with ourselves and honest toward God, we must be aware that we find it hard to sign our wills fully to the Divine control. He or she who has reached the place where, instinctively and without demur, God's will in greater or less things is accepted, has arrived, indeed, at the Beulah land, the stage where the blessed life begins.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS

Through the clouds and the mists,
Through the sun and the shower,
Be this thy one comfort,
In each changeable hour,
That Jesus thy Saviour
Is ever on high.
Keep thy glance on his beauty
Who reigns in the sky.

A Sunday Scrap-Book

A mother in our circle has a bright idea, and passes it on. She writes that she has been impressed with the beauty of the illustrations in our Sunday School columns, many of them being reproductions of pictures by the old masters. In a book of bright-colored cambrics, she has pasted those which she most admires, and every Sunday afternoon she tells the story of the picture her little boy prefers, thus giving him a Sunday

Saving the Birds

MOST of us who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are in fullest sympathy with the Audubon Society, and with others, not connected necessarily with any organization, who desire to save the birds. For two reasons birds are entitled to protection. The first is that their grace and beauty, added to their sweet songs, make them the most attractive of little neighbors, and the second, that they are the best friends of the farmer, and the defenders of the crops, destroying as they do, an immense number of insect marauders, which would else multiply beyond our power to cope with them. Birds are not merely ornamental objects in nature; they are exceedingly and unceasingly useful. A young woman in Texas, who calls herself simply a farmer-girl, has been doing everything she can to fight the greed and vanity which cause a wholesale slaughter of the birds annually in some localities, that women's hats may be adorned with feathers and plumes. She has personally appealed to the Governors of many States, addressing them in the character of a private individual and in most cases she has received courteous replies from these prominent men. Not satisfied with this, the young advocate of the birds has sent paragraphs in their behalf to 100 newspapers and magazines, and wherever she has had a chance to interest acquaintances, she has availed herself of it. Now, her example should be imitated. We shall never put a stop to the destruction of the birds, by talking about it and doing nothing. Each of us must decline to wear wings and plumage on her hat, and each must educate her children into a similar distaste for millinery which is a relic of barbarism. We quote with approval the words of the Governor of Texas: "The fashion which demands the slaughter of beautiful birds for its gratification is truly awful, and I shall rejoice, as I should think all good people will, when it shall disappear before the frown of public opinion and under the ban of law."

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

MARJORY.—It is your house. Have it painted to suit your own taste.

JULIE.—Why hurt the young man's feelings? You can surely be polite.

HANNAH F. L.—Your letter is much prized and is touching and tender. Thanks.

M.—The lady to whom you sent the beautiful poem and letter, sends you her hearty thanks.

IN DOUBT.—It is always permissible to send flowers to one who has served you. Enclose your card.

JULIA.—For your complexion, bathe daily, exercise freely, avoid sweets and fats, and sleep nine hours a day.

ISABEL.—Do not hesitate to excuse yourself to friends when you are ill or busy. I would not use the form "Not at home."

W. A.—Your testimony about your servant speaks well for the mistress. There is always something to be said on both sides.

READER.—You may ask the guest to say grace, or do it yourself. If you are the head of the house, do it yourself as a rule, unless your guest is a clergyman.

MARIE.—Girls wear their hair braided in pig-tails until they are sixteen. Teasing is not to be endured from anybody, if it can be helped.

CATHARINE.—I am sorry that you feel so sensitive about the closeness in age of your little ones. Think how pleasant it will be for them and you a little later on, when they will be such congenial companions. And, if you could only know it, you are living your happiest days now when the children are all under your hand in the home.

"IT WILL TAKE MONEY, MUCH MONEY," SAID THE OLD MAN

treat. The idea of a Bible scrap-book, kept for Sabbath afternoons, is an excellent one. Under each picture may be printed or pasted a text from God's Word. A Bible with good clear type may be cut up for this purpose. A hymn may be added, and the older children in the family may find good rainy day occupation in manufacturing such a book. Children in a hospital, or in a home remote from towns and libraries, will also greatly enjoy such a beautiful scrap-book.

JUST AWAY

I CANNOT say, and I will not say
That he is dead, he is just away.
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand,
He has wandered into an unknown land.
And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there.

And you, oh, you, who the wildest yearn
For the old-time step and the glad return,
Think of him, faring on, as dear
For the love of There as the love of Here.

What it Means to Save a Child

THE CHILDHOOD OF MOSES

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 17.
EXODUS 2: 1-10

By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT--TRAIN UP A CHILD IN THE WAY HE SHOULD GO,
AND WHEN HE IS OLD HE WILL NOT DEPART FROM IT. PROV. 22: 6

WHAT was Moses' birth year? How few can tell without turning! But tie the date with similar dates already familiar and you can never forget.

MOSES BORN	EXODUS	CHRIST	COLUMBUS	LUTHER
1571 B. C.	1491 B. C.	1492 A. D.	1492 A. D.	1517 A. D.

We all know the date of America's discovery, 1492, "after Christ." We shall as easily remember that the Exodus was 1491 "before Christ," when we have once associated these beginnings of great nations. We know Moses was born eighty years before the Exodus, 1571 B. C., and may fix it in mind by grouping Moses with Luther, who began the Reformation in 1517—the same figures, with one changed about.

At the time of Moses' birth, Seti, the Pharaoh of the first chapter of Exodus, had died, and his son Rameses II., the

The Lesson Story Great, was on the throne. He does not seem so very far away now that he has so recently had his photograph taken for the first time. He has been raised from the dead, as it were, to be one more of many such witnesses that the Bible is true. The uncovered Egypt of the explorers is found to be in every respect the Egypt of the Bible.

The hard labor put on the Hebrews by Seti had not prevented their increase, under God's blessing, and so Rameses outwitted Herod by ordering a slaughter of the innocents, the murder of all the boys that should be born in Hebrew homes. The greatest of men was born under that sentence of death in a little slave cabin that was hardly more than a kennel, such as genius often nestles in. In that cabin Amram and Jochebed raised three of the greatest leaders: Miriam, eleven at the time of our story; Aaron, three, and Moses, the new baby. No wonder mothers' clubs to this day call themselves Jochebed societies! Not every faithful mother can give the world children as great as hers, but she can give it children as good.

With what trembling joy Jochebed must have hid her baby in her bosom! How her heart must have fluttered at the slightest sound, lest the executioners were already on her threshold! How she must have tried by all a mother's arts to keep her babe from making cries that would betray him to those who were seeking young children to destroy them! How each day she must have snuggled him closer to her loving heart, thinking it might be the last day she would have him to love! As he grew larger, and his cries grew stronger, she felt that she could conceal him no longer in her home, and so set her mother-wit to work to make a plan by which she might keep him openly and safely. Love is the true mother of invention. She had heard that the daughter of Pharaoh was a childless wife, and so she even planned how her imperilled babe might become the adopted son of the Princess. What boldness there was in the scheme!

The second point in her plan was no less daring, namely, that she should receive a royal appointment as the wet-nurse of her own child! To carry out her plan, she studied carefully the habits of the princess, and found that she came frequently to a certain point at the river Nile to bathe. So Jochebed said to herself, "I will place my sweet child, where his loveliness and helplessness will appeal to her lonely heart. And she took a little basket, and made it water-tight with pitch. How soft she must have made it! And then she must have wrapped her child in the most beautiful clothes she could provide, for so much depended upon the attractiveness of the child. Her babe being snugly tucked in, she launched the tiny boat containing her heart's best treasure, and anchored it safely amid the stiff, tall papyrus stems. She would fain have remained close by, but she knew that her mother-heart would betray her. She, therefore, took her daughter Miriam, into her counsels, and told her to watch what should become of her little brother. Miriam was a wise child for she stood afar off, though near enough to see the little basket. She probably busied herself with gathering lotus flowers, so that her mission might not be apparent. Jochebed's scheme worked well. When the princess came down to bathe, she discovered the tiny ark, and told one of her maids to lift it out, and bring it to her. And when she opened it, she saw the child, "and behold, the babe wept." Her heart was touched. She knew it was one of the doomed Hebrew children, and thought, perhaps, that it had been cast into the river to die, at the king's command. "If I take him for my very own, his life will be safe," she said to herself, and straightway her purpose was formed to make him her adopted son. And she called his name Moses, which meant "drawn out of the water." Miriam came near enough to hear the princess say, "This is one of the Hebrew children," near enough to see the gentle handling, even fondling, of her little brother; near enough to see the expression of mother-love on the face of the princess, and so she thought it was safe for her to offer to get a Hebrew nurse for the babe. The princess assented, and Miriam ran to get her mother. Jochebed's plan was working well. And so the mother received her own child from the hands of the princess, with the promise of wages for his care! No need of listening any longer for the step of the executioner, for her child was under royal protection!

How long could she keep him? Certainly until he was three years old, for Hebrew mothers did not wean their children until they had reached that age. It has even been suggested that the boy lived with his father and mother until he was twelve years of age. There is a legend that when he was hardly more than three years old he was brought by the doting princess into the presence of her father, the king. The crown was playfully placed upon his head, when his tiny hands reached up, took it off, placed it on the floor, and then stood upon it. Great was the alarm at this act, for it had been a saying that the crown of Egypt should be destroyed by an alien.

Beside the picture of Moses, the outcast child, rescued by mother and sister, and king's daughter, place the picture of Moses at the earthly coronation of Christ, on the Mount of Transfiguration, acting as one of the two ambassadors from the court of heaven, and hear in the background "the song of Moses and the Lamb," sung by the redeemed in glory--

Jochebed hardly knew whether to rejoice or lament, she bravely faced the duty of the hour with faith.

The gates of life swing either way,
On noiseless hinges, night and day.
One enters through the open door,
One leaves us to return no more;
And which is happier, which more blest,
God knoweth best.

We greet with smiles the one who comes
Like path sunshine to our hearts and homes,
And reach our longing hands with tears
To him who, in his ripened years,
Goes gladly to his heavenly rest;
God knoweth best.

He guards the gates. We need not dread
The path these little feet must tread,
Nor fear for him who from our sight
Passed through them to the realms of light,
Both in his loving care we rest;
God knoweth best.

We cannot, especially at this season, speak of Moses as an outcast child, and not remember that Jesus was born in a stable, because there was no room for mother in the inn. For his sake and "in I Name," let us plan to rescue every outcast child within our reach. A mother, one might note that when she put her girlie to bed she moved to one side as if to make room for some one else. To her mother's "Why she answered, "I want to leave room for Jesus, because he has not where to lay head." We can best make room for Jesus, caring for the bodies and souls of despised and neglected children, for he said: "In much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me." Phill Brooks once said, in substance, that he would help a child help the world in the best possible way. To translate this lesson literally into life, we must search out the poor foreign children that are born under the curse of their surroundings, for which Government is partly responsible, and seek to save their lives and their souls.

In our lesson, we have a miniature Children's Aid Society, which we should imitate without waiting for a committee. The Faithful Mother tutelage and by-laws. There is danger that we shall lose half our opportunities by waiting for some "committee." First in this child saving group was the faithful mother. "God made mothers before he made ministers," says Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, and he declares that ministers have small chance of saving children whose parents are not leading them to God. Statistics show that the father is influential as the mother. In a test case was found that in families where only the mother was a Christian, one-third of the children were professing Christians, while there were two-thirds where both parents were Christians. A friend visiting a great philosopher met the little daughter at the gate and thinking the child must be taught wonderful things by such a father, asked, "What is your father teaching you?" "Obedience was the child's reply. We may be sure that was Moses' first lesson. He was prepared for command by learning to obey.

Miriam's helpfulness reminds us that older sisters in our homes might do much to safeguard their brothers—not the wise ones alone—against perils worse than those that threatened only the life, not the soul of Moses! Our fears are too much of physical perils. "Fear not what kills the body," Jesus says, "but much more what kills the soul." Moses' sister showed not only wisdom but quiet courage in saving her brother. It is the fashion to excuse girls for being cowardly. They should be ashamed of fear, and aroused to be brave.

A shipwrecked crew in an open boat, drifting helplessly, and apparently hopelessly, on the boundless sea. Their vessel had been wrecked in mid-ocean, and their comrades drowned before their eyes, they were powerless to render help.

Several days had now passed, and not a ship had been sighted. "Will help never come?" cried one poor fellow after another, as daily their faces came more haggard, and into their eyes crept signs of despair. "A sail!" suddenly shouted one of the crew. Color rose in their pallid cheeks, and an earnest "Thank God!" came from their lips, as a small brigantine bore down upon them.

As she drew nearer, the shipwrecked men discerned a woman at the wheel, steering. No one else could be seen on board. What could it mean? The mystery was soon solved when they went aboard. The girl's father, the skipper, and several of the crew, whilst outward bound from Cuba, had died of fever, leaving the daughter and two or three seamen as sole survivors. From her childhood she had accompanied her father in his vessel, and from him had gained a knowledge of nautical matters.

As the seamen knew nothing of navigation, she, brave girl, was steering for Vigo, in the Azores, a big black dog being her constant and faithful companion.

Welcome, indeed, was the aid of the shipwrecked crew who now took turn at the wheel until the anchor was dropped in Vigo Bay.

In the voyage of life let the daughters be ever ready to take the helm when father's or mother's hand fails.

Illustration and Application

Who is the outcast child, and how can mother and sister and king's daughter work with God to save and train him?

"Born of poor but honest parents" is the familiar opening of nearly all the biographies of the world's great leaders. The story of Moses is one of many to cheer the boy who is born amid seeming disadvantages. The race to which he belonged were oppressed immigrant laborers. As they worked under tasks intended to kill many of them, they sang pitifully, like those in like case in modern Egypt, before England took it in hand:

They starve us, they starve us;
They beat us, they beat us.

It is good in all ages to sing away pain with songs of faith as did one whose singing was so entrancing that passing strangers paused to ask a young girl at his door, "Will you please tell us who is singing so sweetly in the cottage?" "Yes, indeed; it is only my Uncle Tim, sir; he's after having a bad turn with his leg and so he's just singing the pain away the while." When her child was born under sentence of death,

PREPARATION FOR SERVICE

The Deliverer of Israel Undergoing Discipline

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

NONE of us can be too grateful for early discipline; nothing in after life can replace it. Those are indeed to be pitied who have grown up to consider their own will and pleasure as the first thing, and who have never learned obedience, self-restraint, or consideration for others. But no parental training can take the place of God's education. There is no school like his. "Who teacheth like him?" (Job 36:22).

The very birth of Moses was connected with the promise of deliverance, and it occurred at the very time when the oppression which Israel suffered was becoming unendurable. Before the children of Israel began to cry to the Lord for deliverance, he was already preparing the deliverer. There must have been some communication of God to his parents about this child. His beauty might have given them the greatest desire to preserve his life; but it could not have inspired them with faith for his preservation; faith must have a word of God to rest upon. It is more than possible that God made known to these parents, as he afterwards made known to Zacharias and Elizabeth concerning their son, the future of the child.

What a moment must that have been when Miriam brought a royal command to the believing mother to do what her heart longed for, but which was forbidden by the law—to take her beloved babe and nurse him! Thus God responds to faith. "Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages." She was even to be rewarded for that service, which otherwise would have been against the king's command. "With God all things are possible, and all things are possible to him that believeth" (Mark 10:27, 9:23). What a joy, but what a responsibility for this mother, to use every opportunity to instil right principles into the heart of her son as his intelligence began to develop. He had been saved from death that he might serve God's purpose. What a type of those who by faith have "passed from death unto life," that they may "live no more unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again!"

Jochebed was to nurse her son for Pharaoh's daughter, and consequently when he grew old enough he matriculated in the schools of Egypt, and became an apt scholar. "Pharaoh's daughter . . . nourished him for her own son, and Moses was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." He was evidently one of the scholars of the day, and a man who made his mark; for he was "mighty in his words and works" (Acts 7:21, 22, R.V.). But through the instrumentality of a mother's training, the grace of God awakened him to something which he esteemed more than the high position which his adopted mother destined for him. We may well believe that Pharaoh's daughter was proud of her adopted son, and that she expected her country would be a gainer by his talents, cultivation and personal influence. But deep down in his heart there were mightier influences at work than earthly glory and power. He knew God, and saw things from God's point of view. He understood the call of God to him to be the Deliverer of his people, and no doubt many a time of prayer was witnessed from the unseen world in the house of Amram when Moses could steal away to see his parents.

Moses had had his test, first of all, as to whether he would remain true to God when all his education in the schools must have received its tone from the State religion of Egypt, which was gross idolatry. And Moses had passed through all and still stood true to God. "When he was well-nigh forty years old, it came into his heart [no doubt from God] to visit his brethren, the children of Israel" (Acts 7:23). He "looked on their burdens," he began to take in what they were suffering, and seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, smiting the Egyptian; and he supposed that his brethren understood that God, by his hand, was giving them deliverance, but they understood not (Acts 24, 25, R.V.). How was this? Was he not the chosen deliverer? Surely yes; but he had many examinations to pass in God's school before he would be ripe for the office which he so rashly took upon himself. When he smote the Egyptian, he "looked this way and that, and when he saw that there was no man, he smote him" (Exod. 2:12). This is not the way of faith. Faith looks only one way, up to God, and then it does not matter what man may be present; there is no need to fear. And yet, down in the depth of his heart, he was loyal to God and to his people. He knew what taking up the cause of his people involved, and he faced it. By faith he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Perhaps the alternative was at this time presented to him. But he chose rather to be evil entreated with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. He knew that it would be sin in him to forsake his true vocation. Accounting the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he looked for the recompense of the reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king; for he endured as seeing him who is invisible

(Heb. 11:24-27, R.V.). Moses' school was a severe one at this time. Everything seemed against him. He had been ready, from loyalty to God and love to his people, to forsake the most enviable position, probably, in the then known world. And what, after all, did his heroic sacrifice accomplish? His brethren did not believe in his vocation, which he knew he had received from God, and for which he had given up so much, and when he attempted to reconcile two of them which strove together, they only reproached him, saying, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? Thinkest thou to kill me as thou killedst the Egyptian yesterday?" Poor Moses! he had yet to learn that, to do God's work, he must know how to do it in God's time and in God's way. His heroic enthusiasm might do for the mighty words and works for which he was famed in his service in Egypt, but God needs no might from man but simple faith and obedience; and big Moses must become little Moses before he could be any use to God.

Moses "feared." Faith never fears; but "he said, Surely the thing is known," and he fled, for "Pharaoh sought to kill him." He had lost his all in Egypt, and had made the position of his people no better at all; and he, the chosen deliverer of God's people, really called of God, had to flee from Egypt as a criminal to escape justice!

A Church in a Tree

NEXT to the giants of the Yosemite Valley, California, the largest trees in the world are found in Australia. Of these, a species of the eucalyptus, locally known as the "red gum-tree," takes the lead. One of these giant trees in Gippsland, Victoria, was felled at a distance of twenty feet from the ground. The wood of these trees is very soft when growing, and when newly cut down, but hardens when it is dead. In this tree, while the wood was still soft, the stump was hollowed out, openings for doors and windows were cut, and a roof was placed upon it. In this way a room was formed, said to be twenty-five feet in breadth, and capable of accommodating fifty people. Religious services have frequently been held there, the people for miles around assembling out of curiosity; but this curiosity has led to blessing, and a movement is now on foot for erecting a substantial church.

A Timely Gift

Mrs. A. S. Steele, Founder and Manager of the Steele Home for needy children, Chattanooga, Tenn., writes to the proprietor of the CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

"I received twenty-five dollars as a gift. What a surprise! Surely it comes at a good time, when I have over 120 needy children to shoe as well as to provide with warm winter clothing. How such a gift does strengthen my faith! Looking at these things from a human standpoint, it does seem wonderful to know that all these years (nearly eighteen) since I started this home, I've never had to solicit a dollar, directly or indirectly, I've never run in debt, I've never been sick in bed a whole day, and yet I've received and cared for over 800 inmates here. I've clothed, fed, trained and educated them, hiring many helpers. It has surely been a precious privilege to care for so many whom nobody wanted and for whom no one was willing to care, because, at the time, they were too young, or too sick, or too troublesome, or too vicious. No church or society or individual is pledged to aid us in any way. This county pays me thirteen cents a day for each child sent here by the Judge only until the day it is ten years old, after that I keep them at my own expense. I have a pension of $12 per month. That is the only salary I have or have had in this work. Yet, thus far, the Lord has provided for us, though I've no idea, from day to day, from what sources the gifts of cash or clothing, shoes or soap, bread or bedding may come. If I knew the name of the donor, I'd write a personal letter to him or her.

"1900" FAMILY WASHER FREE.

Greatest Invention of the Age. Labor and Expense of Washing Clothes Cut in Two.

More Stopping, Rubbing or Boiling of Clothes.

Every Household Needs One.

HE "1900" BALL-BEARING FAMILY WASHER

Sent FREE to anyone answering this advertisement, without delay or advance payment of any kind, freight paid. The day's trial. The 1900 Ball-Bearing Washer is unquestionably the greatest labor-saving machine invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. There are no wheels, rollers, rockers, cranks or complicated machinery. It revolves on bicycle ball bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required, a child can operate it. More stopping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Water and soap all that is needed. It will wash quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in 6 minutes. Impossible to injure the most delicate fabrics. As the Sup't. of the Savannah Yacht Club says: "It is a wonder. Our washing is very large and we have always had two women on Monday and on Tuesday. Our work and the yard boy now do the washing in 4 hours much better than before."

NEWMAN, Ill., July 5, 1900. "I can testify that the 1900 is the best washer and the most running machine. It will absolutely clean all these cuffs and bottoms of ladies' white skirts that can be done by hand. The washings that usually take from 5 to 7 hours to put out by hand, can now be done in 2 hours."
R. A. SKINNER.
KINSELE, Ky., March 21, 1900. "I had a double washing for myself yesterday and made all my laundry, besides all my cooking, milking and housework. It takes less soap and water than in the old way. I have no need of the washer any more."
Mrs. L. A. BARTON.
ONASASKA, Wis., Jan. 4, 1901. "I am a family of 5, and as I had a 2 weeks' wash at an immense one. Had it all out in 6 hours and had never looking clothes. I did not even put my hands into the water. I cannot too strongly recommend the 1900 Washer."
Mrs. J. M. WILSON.

WIFE-SELLING AMONG THE KURDS

KURDISH SHEPHERDS AND THEIR FLOCKS

Dr. Joseph Jacob, son of a native pastor who did missionary work among the Mohammedans of Urmi for many years. Dr. Jacob has studied medicine in London for several years and only recently returned to Persia. Husband and wife will now continue together in Christian missionary work.

Concerning the illustrations which accompany her letter, Mrs. Jacob writes:

"These were taken on my last journey. As there was no photographer nearer than Sabolagh, I had to write to one to come from that place. One of the photographs shows a Kurdish sheepfold at midday, when the little lambs meet their mothers. It was a beautiful sight, and one of the pleasantest memories of my life to see a hundred or more soft, beautiful lambs, each trying to find its own mother sheep. What wonderful love is given even to animals! In the centre of the picture are several women who, having milked the goats, are now shaking the skin (filled with sour and fermented milk) and making butter out of it. A few shepherds are standing near. The tents in the background are the folds in which the sheep lie at night. "Another photograph shows the Kurda bazaar of which I gave you an account in a recent letter. Girls are sold in this bazaar sometimes. Nearby a number of lepers have made their home, and some of these unfortunates are seen standing in front. Still another photograph shows five Kurdish ladies in the ancient style of dress. In the last picture, the tall man on the right is selling his wife to the smaller man on the left unheeding the mother's sorrow over her children being taken away from her. She does not like her new husband, to whom she has been sold; yet she has no more power to protest than the sheep and cattle that are brought to the bazaar to be sold. The final photograph is that of your correspondent in the ancient Kurdish dress, spinning wool."

It will be remembered that in a previous letter, our correspondent had described the Kurdish custom of wife-selling, and also of making a present of a wife to a friend or guest. These customs have apparently prevailed among the Kurds from time immemorial. Kurdish chiefs often have an amazing plurality of wives. Indeed, the advent of a new wife is, in some of the homes of the great, an event of almost annual occurrence. Such a condition of morals inevitably produce domestic chaos, and the very worst form of misery and unhappiness.

A BLASPHEMER CONVERTED

THE following remarkable experience is related by a student of the late Evangelist Moody:

"One evening during some special meetings held recently, the gentleman who was working with me went with me to take supper at the house of a man considerably over middle age. From his early days this man had been a horse-trader, and was known as the most blasphemous man in the community. During supper I got into conversation with him about his relation to the Lord Jesus Christ, and tried to show him some passages from the Bible. He told me that this was useless, for, in the first place, he didn't know whether that was the Word of God or not, and in the second place he couldn't read, and wouldn't know whether I was telling him truly what the Bible said. I lifted my heart to God for guidance, and said to him: "My friend, it may be that you cannot read, and that you do not know whether this really is the Word of God or not, but you do know that something is there, placing my hand on his breast, 'tells you that what I have told you about your own sinfulness and God's love is all true.' "The words went home. He assented to all that I said, and asked me to show him just how he could be saved. There and then this old hardened sinner accepted Jesus as his Saviour. My friend and I knelt with him in prayer, and he poured out his heart to God for forgiveness and in thanksgiving. When we got up from our knees, I said to him:

"The next thing for you to do is to confess Christ before men," showing him Romans 10: 9, 10. He demurred at first, saying: "Why, the people will only laugh at me if I get up!" But I held him to it, and finally he promised he would do so at the meeting. We went over to the meeting together, and when the time came, and he got up to testify, it was just as he had anticipated—the whole audience burst out in shouts of derisive laughter. He said to me afterwards, "Now, didn't I tell you what they would do?" I said, "Yes, but are any bones broken? Did it do you any harm?" "No." "All right," I said: "now keep on confessing Christ."

"The next evening he got up and gave his testimony again amid similar shouts of laughter and assertions that he wouldn't last another twenty-four hours. But the next evening he was on hand again with his testimony, to the amazement of the whole community, who began to see that there was power after all in the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ to save a man from sin. To make a long story short, his wife and children, and those of his grandchildren who were old enough to understand, have all accepted the Lord Jesus Christ. Through the old man's earnest perseverance a little church has been erected in the village, where formerly there was no religious service."

MISSIONS*

Progress Made During the Century a Basis of Hope for the Great Consummation

GOSPEL work in this dispensation is outlined in the verses associated with the topic. Not by imperial edict, not by legislation, do men become Christians, but by individual choice. The offer to Christ, in his days of temptation in the wilderness, of the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, showed an entire misconception of his mission. The kingdom at which Christ aimed was a conquest far higher, infinitely more difficult, than the tempter ever conceived. Christ would have men choose him for their king, because they believed in him and loved him and he did not want any in his kingdom who came from any other motive. Anyone who was looking for riches, or honor, or power, had better keep away. They would be disappointed. The rewards he had to offer were of a different order. Only people who ardently desired them, who were prepared to make sacrifices to attain them, were eligible to become his subjects. These privileges and rewards were to be fully explained, and every man who appreciated them and fulfilled the conditions, was to be admitted. Thus the explanation, the proclamation, the preaching, was the initial step. "How should they believe in him of whom they had not heard?" The statement of the rewards and the privileges of a member of the kingdom was to be made, and when the message reached men who desired them, the way to attain them was to be made plain. No one was to be forced into the kingdom.

In that way the kingdom has grown from its small beginning. Force and compulsion have never been applied. So it will be to the end. Eventually there will come a time when every tongue on earth will own Jesus as Lord. The past century has witnessed a long step toward that glorious consummation. No generation since the time of Christ contained so many of his followers as this. The work among the heathen, which was in its infancy a hundred years ago, is now being prosecuted by thirteen thousand missionaries, aided by seventy thousand native workers. A million and a quarter heathens have given satisfactory evidence of a change of heart and are now in connection with churches in heathen lands. In civilized lands the preaching goes on, and multitudes are being added to the kingdom, but with all this effort, though Roman Catholic and Greek churches are included, less than one-third of this generation is even nominally Christian. The Protestant churches of the whole world do not contain more than 162,000,000, while the population of the world is over fifteen hundred millions. About one person in ten is all that can be counted as belonging even nominally to the Protestant faith. How much, therefore, remains to be done before the world is won for Christ! Confucianism in China claims 256,000,000; Hindooism, 190,000,000; Mohammedanism, 176,000,000; Buddhism, 147,000,000, and so on. This is discouraging, but when we remember the situation in the year 1800, the progress that has been made seems to be enormous. Then, all told, there were not more than 200,000,000 Christians in the whole world; now the number is over 500,000,000. If the same ratio is maintained during the century on which we have entered, the generation which witnesses the beginning of the twenty-first century will be over one-half Christian.

One strong ground for hope is that in heathen lands so much pioneer work has been done. The seed sown in the beginning of missions is coming to the harvest. In India, especially, the aid rendered through this journal to the famine-stricken people is having a mighty influence. Missionaries report the breaking down of prejudice and a realization of the superiority of Christianity to other religions such as never was witnessed before. The missionary who was enabled by our readers to feed the starving, is welcomed now when he carries the message of the Bread of Life, in cities where once he was opposed and persecuted. He is cautious about receiving converts now, lest it be said that they are becoming Christians from interested motives. But the time is not far distant when a great accession may be expected.

Besides this, there is ground for hope, in the better organization of missionary work. The Ecumenical Conference in New York brought the laborers in the field together and there was a beginning made in union and fraternity which had previously been absent. Not in rivalry, but in holy emulation will the societies work in the future, and there is even prospect in some fields of co-operation. If, as we may hope, the time is coming when the societies agree to preach Christ to the heathen world without distinction of sect or creed, we shall be brought nearer still to the glorious victory, in which the kingdoms of darkness are all illuminated by the rays of the Sun of Righteousness.

Botaka's Conversion

From the Congo Mission comes this interesting story of the conversion of a girl, which is sent by Miss Lily Ruskin:

A girl of about seventeen years of age, named Botaka, was a member of the school here until about six months ago, and also for a long time a member of the seekers' class. She professed to be converted, and when present at the baptismal service when Boluka and Yek'okwala were baptized, I remember her saying, as we came up from the river: "Mamma! I am dying of sorrow because I was not thought worthy to be baptized with these other women."

From that time onward she earnestly wished to be received into the Church. It was thought best that she should undergo a thorough testing before she was received, and so it was put off for a time. During this waiting time she proved, not only to us, but to the people in the town (which was in some ways more important), that she was born again, and really lived out, as far as she knew how, the life imparted to her by the Holy Spirit.

At the March meeting the names of Botaka, Bomolo and Iseyambindo were proposed for church fellowship, and approved of, but as Botaka was sick (as we thought not very seriously), her case was postponed for a later date. On Sunday morning, March 14, the other two candidates were baptized, Bomolo, a woman about thirty, and Iseyambindo, an elderly man. We had a very good service with the realized presence of the Lord, and looked forward to the not distant time when we should again assemble thus at the baptism of Botaka. But God had other plans for his child, for only two or three days after she was received into the "Church militant," she entered into the presence of her Lord, and saw him face to face.

Of course, we grieve, because it seems to our imperfect vision a loss to the work; but yet does not the Lord of the vineyard know what is best for his own work far better than we? The testimony of all who were with her during the last few days of her illness, is that her one subject of conversation was Christ and salvation.

PARALYSIS AND COFFEE.

Symptoms Disappear when Drug is Abandoned.

"Tea and coffee were forbidden by my physician, for I had symptoms of paralysis, and it was plain that the coffee was the cause of the trouble. I began using Postum Food Coffee and am now a steady advertisement for Postum. The old symptoms of paralysis disappeared in a very brief time after I began the use of Postum and quit the use of coffee. Do not use my name publicly, if you please."—Morrow, O. The above name can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Coffee is such a direct poison to the nerve centers of many highly organized people that it produces all sorts of disorders, from stomach and bowel troubles, palpitation of the heart, kidney troubles, etc., up to more intricate nervous diseases, such as paralysis. The way to keep well is to leave off coffee or any nerve destroyer of the sort, and use Postum Food Coffee, which is a direct re-builder of the nerve centers. Sure and well defined improvement in health will follow this course, as can be proven by any person who will make the trial.

Two Comanche Evangelists
No better illustration could be given of the manner in which the Indians of the Southwest are turning into the strait and narrow path, than a little incident witnessed in a restaurant at Lawton recently. An Indian, a large man of mature years, a Kiowa half-breed, entered. He was dressed like a white man, and had an intelligent appearance; but he seemed nervous and ill at ease about something. The place was crowded with a hurrying lot of business men, anxious to get back to their work. Heads were turned toward the red man, as he seated himself at one of the crowded tables. Finally he seemed to pull himself together, and raising his hands above the table, he looked around the board, saying: "Me Jesus man." He then proceeded to say the simple words of blessing the food. The incident touched all who were present.

BIG EAGLE AND SQUAW

There are a number of Indian Christians of the Wichita and Comanche tribes spreading the light of the Gospel in the foot hills of the Wichita Mountains. Camp meetings are now taking the place of medicine dances, and are carried on with the same fervor which has heretofore characterized the wild dances. The Comanches are led by Big Eagle and his squaw, both converts for the past five years. They are not accompanied by any white people, and carry on their work in a simple but effective manner. Some of the half-breeds who were present say that as many as fifty converts are made at a single meeting.

Led His Bible Class 25 Years

Mr. Charles H. Knox is the leader of a large Bible class of 1,500 members, which meets in the Knox Memorial Church on Forty-first street, New York. He has been the leader of this class for twenty-five years, during which it has been steadily growing. About three years ago the present Knox Memorial Church, and a spacious Bible class-room was provided. The church is a memorial to the Rev. John Knox, D.D., grandfather of Charles H. Knox. The class leader is a well-known member of the New York Bar. He was formerly the President of the Board of Education of the city of New York, and is now the President of the Municipal Civil Service Commission of that city.

WHOM HAVE I?

WHOM have I, Lord, in heaven but thee?
My Maker and my King.
With joy I own thee as my God,
And grateful tribute bring.
Whom have I, Christ, on earth but thee?
Jesus, my risen Lord;
O, fill me with thy Spirit now,
And guide me by thy Word.
Whom have I in my heart but thee?
Thou Holy Spirit blest,
My body make thy dwelling place,
And give me perfect rest.

This Doily of finest linen, stamped with the most exquisite designs ever shown in this country, ready to work, with full instructions and pattern, in colors showing the exact effect of every thread so that the most unpracticed can work it perfectly. Also lessons by the world renowned Art Embroiderers, Prof. Tsumo Takahashi and wife, of Japan. Our system is a new one, and the only perfectly easy and simple plan yet devised. It makes it impossible for even a child to err in doing the work. Some of these designs of ours on this linen are alone sold in stores for as high as $2.50 each. Catalogue of 34 designs sent free. Attached to above most unusual offer (all being free) we make but one fair condition, viz.—that you promise to ask for and accept from your dealer only Richardson's Silks when you work on the designs.

Address, inclosing 10 cents to pay registration postage.

THE RICHARDSON SILK CO., Dept. G, 180 to 184, Adams St., Chicago.

NOTE. The Richardson's Silks in competition with all the world were awarded the Grand Prize at the Paris Exposition, together with three Special Gold Medals for Embroidery Silks and other items in this line. Therefore, it is not alone over other American silks that we claim superiority. Richardson's Silks have won the right to be recognized as better than any other silks in the world. Americans everywhere give us due credit for this international achievement.

MAJESTIC
...PROGRESS IN COOKING...
There were reasons, perhaps, why the New England "Boiled Dinner" was cool enough in its day. Some people still seem to be satisfied with that kind of living. Even an iron pot over an open fire may answer in such cases if nothing better happens to be at hand. People who believe in progress in cooking, however, as well as in the other arts of living, who insist upon having the best, show a decided preference for the great MAJESTIC Malleable Iron and Steel RANGE It is the range that pays for itself by saving bills for repairs and by cutting down bills for fuel, that gives uniformly perfect service because it works well all the time, and that lasts for generations, properly used. A postal request will bring our New Book—"All About Majestic Ranges and Kitchen Arrangements." MAJESTIC MANUFACTURING CO. 45 Cliff Street, New York. 2040 Morgan Street, St. Louis, Mo.

The Wonderful Zobo

A REAL NOVELTY FOR ENTERTAINMENTS AND PARTIES

The most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced, so constructed that it amplifies and changes the human voice so wonderfully as to make it strange, weird and unnatural beyond all comprehension. It seems impossible for it to accomplish so much. It gives you the vocal power of ten giants, yet its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove. Money and music-making feature for CHURCH CHOIRS and other Concerts. SING INTO MOUTH-PIECE, ZOBO DOES THE REST.

25c. SPECIAL OFFER.—To introduce the wonderful ZOBO we will send one carefully packed, together with our handsomely illustrated catalogue, prepaid for 25c. Warranted just as represented or money cheerfully refunded.

The Great Expectation

All Christians of the First Century in Accord in the Hope of Christ's Second Coming

BY REV. GEO. S. MOODY

NO one can read the New Testament with care without discovering that the members of the Early Church were men of hope as well as men of faith. Indeed, hope seems, more than faith, to have been the conspicuous feature of their character. Their faith looked back to Calvary; but, in a sense, it was an act completed. They were not always looking backward; forward they peered with steady gaze. The attitude of expectation was their daily, hourly attitude. To them it clearly seemed a consummation most devoutly to be wished. They constantly referred to it as "a lively hope," "that blessed hope," "this hope," "one hope," "our hope," "the hope of our calling," the hope set before us." Every reference shows that it completely filled their hearts, and was the dominating influence in their lives.

The late beloved evangelist D. L. Moody made the admission that he was originally much opposed to this doctrine, "until," said he, "from constantly meeting with it in the reading of Scripture, I was constrained to become a believer in it, and now it is, to my mind, one of the most precious truths in the whole Bible."

It could not be a spiritual advent they were looking for; a coming of the Lord into their hearts, for quickening and enlightenment; for such sweet spiritual presence they had never lost. "Lo, I am with you always," he had said, "even to the end of the world;" and evermore "Christ in the heart the hope of glory" was to them a living, grand reality. They did not need a coming of that kind.

Nor could they mean the destruction of the city of Jerusalem; and passing strange it seems that this should ever have been thought to have fulfilled the prophecy. What was there in this sad event to constitute a hope? It was a hope these men possessed! What had this city's fall to do with Gentile saints? Yet they, as well as Jews, were made partakers of the Church's hope. Above all, why, if the destruction of Jerusalem fulfilled the Scriptures relative to Christ's return—why was the coming of the Lord proclaimed, and eagerly desired, long after Salem's towers were in the dust? The Gospel according to John was surely written after that. So were his three Epistles, and the Book of Revelation. The testimony of the Early Fathers is also to the effect that the hope of Christ's return remained, like a meteor in the heavens, long after Jerusalem was removed.

No; if Greek and English words have any meaning, those employed by the apostles and the Fathers, with their equivalents in our own mother tongue, all go to show that a personal and glorious coming of the Lord was what those men of God were waiting for. No other coming ever crossed their minds.

The reasons for such unanimity and enthusiasm in the entertainment of this hope, must have been both weighty and worthy. The foremost reason must have been, that Christ himself had said he would return. The word of seers and prophets, of apostles and of angels, was of use, and these had all united to affirm that he would come again; but, after all, the Master of the House, rather than any servant, was the One whose word was to be heard. If he said, even once, he would return, that would be quite sufficient for the faithful heart. Many times the Lord had pledged his word to this effect. He said distinctly, "If I go . . . I will come again." "I will come to you." "I go away and come again unto you." He spoke of himself as the "Son of Man," who should "come in the glory of his Father;" as the "Nobleman" who "went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return;" as the "Master" for whose coming the servants were to watch; the "Bridegroom," whose appearing the wise virgins all would hail; and as the "Lord who yet would come and reckon with the stewards of his house. In these, and many ways beside, the gracious Lord assured his loved ones he would come again, and they, with trustful hearts, were content to just take him at his word.

Would God this were the Church's hope to-day! Only comparatively few within her bounds lay hold of it. The doctrine of the Second Advent is by most neglected, although the Word of God is full of it. When not entirely relegated to the lumber room, it is often held up to ridicule, and they who dare to say that they believe in it are treated as well-meaning folk, perhaps, but—simple souls, and far behind the age. Well, some of us are quite content to be behind the age. Whenever it, in any matter, goes ahead of Jesus Christ and his immediate followers, we shall let it go. Simple we may seem to modern men to be; but it is the ancient truth we hold, the good old way we tread; and though we look "like them that dream," we still will watch and wait the coming of our Lord.

* From his article in the October number of The Prophet, News, which contains also "Prophecy and Promise," by Rev. T. Graham, M.A.; the Zionist Congress, etc. Price six cents. For sale by M. E. Munson, 77 Bible House, New York.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

M. R., Texas, writes:

For nine years I prayed for the conversion of a loved one; God has heard and answered my prayer.

A. Louise Morris, Bridgeport, Conn., writes:

I desire to acknowledge publicly my gratitude to my Heavenly Father for his marvelous answer to my prayer. God fulfils his word when we abide in him.

Martha Kimond, Acree, Ga., writes:

I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers. I am thankful to my blessed Heavenly Father for the many times he has heard my prayers. I am poor and alone, but he is indeed the band of the widow.

L. G. F., Honeoye Falls, N. Y., writes:

I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayer. I was in deep trouble, and I prayed earnestly and in faith, and he heard me. How can I doubt him, there are so many promises in his word? Have faith, and pray without ceasing.

Mrs. M. B. C., Triune, Tenn., writes:

I receive so much comfort from reading "Answered Prayers" that I want to add my testimony. I have prayed that ways might be opened up for my children, and they have been, and that God is taking care of them. Let his holy name be praised.

P. W. J., Boston, Mass., writes:

I was in trouble day and night. I prayed to my Heavenly Father to help me. My prayer is answered. In him will I ever trust. Blessed be God who hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercies from me. I will sing praises to my God all my life.

M. H. W., Springfield, S. Dak., writes:

I wish to add my testimony to the many who have had prayers answered. Not alone in the great things, but in the common every-day affairs of life God has heard and answered my prayers.

M. C. Kirby, Pa., writes:

I feel I owe it to God and men to write and add my testimony. I prayed for the safety of a very dear friend, and God heard and answered my prayer. I have received much comfort in reading "Answered Prayers." May this testimony be a help to some discouraged souls.

L. E. O., Gravois Mills, Mo., writes:

I have had so many blessings sent me, so much mercy shown me in answer to prayer, that I should be thankful to be the means of causing some unhappy soul to find relief in the same way. I have had a season of special trial, in which no one but God could help me. But he has helped me, and answered my prayers in such wonderful ways that I find myself repeating "O that men would know God for his mercy and his wonderful works to children of men." I am thankful for this department in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We need to acknowledge God's goodness to us, and strengthen one another's faith.

The Peopling of Our Continent

In the latest number of The American Antiquarian, the following appears concerning the peopling of the American continent: "The theories which have been made by various explorers in different parts of the continent show that there must have been different peoples on the continent before the discovery. It is hinted at by those who have explored the mounds and noticed the difference in the objects as well as the art products. The examination of the symbols in Central America compared with those found in Southern Asia, would suggest that there was then an ancient cultus which differed from that of the native, and give evidence of contact with New Zealand in pre-Columbian times. The most conclusive evidence is that which is furnished by the examination of the portraits found scattered over the continent. No one can look at these portraits without recognizing Malay faces, and at the same time noticing features and head ornaments which are very different from the Malays, and which remind us of the best type of Asiatic faces; that they resemble Aryan faces more than they do Malays or Mongolians, and yet they differ from them. It will be acknowledged by all that on the northwest coast there are carved columns which resemble those in New Zealand. If one will go through the Field Museum, in Chicago, he will find a carved post in the New Zealand room which is identical with others from Alaska, with the very same head and head-dress and symbols, which present most striking and startling resemblances."

Sympathy Over McKinley's Death

From many quarters of the globe—Canada, Mexico, Great Britain, Germany, and the islands of the sea—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD received letters from its readers, expressing the general sorrow over the death of President McKinley. A missionary correspondent from Porto Rico writes describing the public use of deep bereavement, for the people of that island regarded the late President as their personal benefactor. At St. John (Antigua), Thomas (Danish W. I.) and George (town America), memorial services were held, and tributes were paid by press and pulpit to the dead President. Rev. W. Haupt, of Dantzig, Germany, writes of the general sorrow in that city over the affliction, and asks "which of us is sure of his life nowadays?"

I. These questions are printed Four weeks in advance so as to afford all our readers an opportunity to answer them.

II. For answers to the questions which appear below, when accepted, we will allow compensation for the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

III. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date in which they are intended to appear.

IV. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

V. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

VI. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of THE MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VII. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper. Correspondents answering more than one question should append their name and address to each answer.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions will be Answered Dec. 11

1. What would be the best course of Bible reading for a small circle of young or newly converted Christians, who know little of the sacred volume and are anxious to become well acquainted with it?

2. Could the tempter have fulfilled his offer to Christ (Matt. 4:9) if it had been accepted?

3. Who was Apollonius and what were the leading features of his philosophy?

4. What is the tradition of the two brothers connected with the site of Solomon's temple?

5. What amount (weight or quantity) of solid food per diem is considered by competent authorities to be required for a man and what for a woman?

Questions of the Week

1. A Western Sunday School is divided on the problem presented in the parable of the Prodigal Son, as to which was the better character of the two, the one who left his father's home or the one who remained there. What is the solution?

So far as I can judge, the elder son seems a little narrow, a little selfish, perhaps. It may be that in his life of unremitting duty, no circumstance had occurred to develop the larger charities the father was putting into practice. But he had lived up to all the cardinal virtues, while to the younger son is charged a whole catalogue of vices. That he retained the wisdom to see his folly, and was noble enough to return to his father and acknowledge his guilt was sufficient proof of a desire to retrieve in the future the errors of the past, to call forth the father's forgiveness. The ordering of the feast seems to have been just an ebullition of joy, which, to the sore conscience of the prodigal, must have been sweet indeed. It left no doubt as to his status of sonship in his father's heart or home. But at best he was a laborer in the vineyard at the sixth or ninth hour; and, since we have no record as to what use he made of his restored possibilities in the succeeding years, the score seems largely in favor of the elder brother, who had ever given a man's serious service to the world's constant need.

S. T. G.

In this "pearl of parables," as in the two which precede it, Christ is defending his course in receiving publicans and sinners (Luke 15:1), of whom the prodigal son is the type. He is rebuking the Pharisees and Scribes, verse 2, for murmuring instead of rejoicing at his receiving sinners. Of these Pharisees and scribes the elder son is type. Surely the younger, with his deep penitence, is the better of the two. The captious Jewish hierarchy, says a writer on this subject, "were still in church relations 'ever with' God. Yet they were forfeiting their organic sonship by being like this elder son 'angry' because Jesus was calling wanderers home." Little, indeed, of the angelic is therein that piety which wraps itself in cold self-complacency and refuses to be glad when sinners long estranged come back to God. We must guard indeed against the error of thinking that the repentant are dearer to God than the life-long Christian. If the late-returning sinner is welcomed with joy, the faithful, life-long believer is regarded with deep satisfaction better still. But of such a believer the elder brother hardly seems a type.

2. Is it better to use the singular, or the plural, verb in speaking of the United States—"The United States is" or "The United States are"?

When the concept is of a plural nature, the verb is written in the plural; but when the concept partakes of the singular idea, the verb is written in the singular form. "Happy is that people [nation] whose God is the Lord." Ps. 144:15. "Bring forth the blind people [individuals] that have eyes," Is. 43:8. Here we have a word in one sentence used with a singular verb, and in the other with a plural verb, according as the concept partakes of the singular or the plural idea. "The United States is a powerful nation," is perfectly proper; also, that "The United States form a bulwark of strength," is equally good; and in would answer such a person very politely, but firmly, thus: "I am sorry, but I cannot loan you any 'more' of my books, etc.," or whatever else it may be. If I buy a tool, for instance, it is because I need the instrument, and while I would have no objections to loan it to someone who may need it for a while, and who, I feel, will return it when through, I certainly would not lend it to a person who I know (perhaps from previous experience) will not return it. I do not see that the Bible reference in Luke 6:35 could have any direct reference to such a case. If a person loaned out his articles to such borrowers too often he would soon be without anything, and would be encouraging (in my opinion) a species of robbery.

BERRY.

The enforcement of the just rule to do to others as you would have them do to you would undoubtedly have a salutary effect upon him who is quick to borrow and forgets to return, who is ever ready to assume an obligation and dilatory in fulfilling same. This is a decidedly undesirable trait of character and it is your duty to impress upon him this unpleasant fact, to the extent of discouraging, if not altogether eradicating it, first, by personal example of the contrary virtue; second, trine, but if carefully and prayerfully pondered, we believe it will be seen to be the only safe and scriptural attitude for the Christian.

W. J. M.

Hardly. There are so many opportunities for turning his well-meant intentions wrong, that in nine cases out of ten he is posing himself to misrepresentations and persecutions that will result in his ruin. This is not a fanciful view. It has been demonstrated time and again. Politicians generally have slight scruples when it comes to carrying the point or ruining one's reputation. The minister should take frequent opportunities to urge upon his hearers the duty of voting for good men and measures, but he will surely make enemies by taking sides.

L. T. RIGHTSELL.

From the pulpit, no. Not that it is inherently wrong, but because it usurps the short hours which should be devoted to the position of God's laws. Elsewhere, the pastor is not only privileged, but duty bound to urge men to so administer public affairs so that God's will and the interest of the community shall be best served.

ROBERT MCBURNEY.

5. If a woman brings suit for divorce, and her husband is innocent of the charges brought against him, but is willing that his wife should get a divorce, should he allow the case to go against him by default, or should he vindicate himself, at the risk of perpetuating an uncongenial union?

Non-resistance is the law of Christ. The Christian should never resist evil, either for the saving of his goods or for his reputation. Mat. 5:39, H. 10:34. The man in question should not refuse to vindicate himself for selfish reasons, but release himself from an "uncongenial union," but he should refuse to vindicate himself on Scriptural grounds. God will take care of his reputation, and his future happiness. It is a question of policy or expediency. What is right should be the first question, and then should be done, and consequences left with God. "A good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly."

W. J. MOSIER.

He ought to vindicate himself, otherwise he is in a position analogous to that of a man compounding a felony. To his advantage he will gain by silence in being released from an uncongenial marriage should not be considered. He should do right without regard to his own advantage or disadvantage. He owes it to his own good name and to the community prove his innocence. If he is silent and allows the case to go against him by default, his guilt will be presumed, and his example will be quoted and will do harm, especially if he is a Christian. There is no need to make an effort to oppose the granting of a divorce, but ought to go on the stand and make a solemn declaration of his innocence. If he does not he contributes to an outrage on justice, and is in legal phrase particeps criminis—a partaker in crime.

Miscellaneous Questions

W. C. R., Bonny Eagle, Minn. Your proposition for the erection, by popular subscription, of McKinley arch to span Pennsylvania Ave., Washington, is an interesting one. We agree with you that it should meet with a ready and universal response.

S. A. L., Mooresville, N. C. If a majority vote him he is certainly right to accept, provided he can perform the duties satisfactorily to the church. The fact that a clique may oppose, however, would undoubtedly deter some men from accepting, as would mean lack of harmony and trouble ahead.

all similar cases the concept will determine the number of the verb. WM. T. HESTAND.

It is a matter entirely dependent upon the thought and meaning of the speaker. The singular verb is, however, to be preferred. It is a collective noun, governed by the same grammatical regulations as "family." Thus, "the family is in want," is preferable to, "the family are in want." So also here, "the United States is," rather than, "the United States are," although the latter is correct and fully authorized by good grammarians. We refer to the consolidation of the forty-five States as one single unit, without reference to the individual States which compose the collection. But when we consider the individual States which form this compact we may, without error, say "the United States are."

3. What is the best answer to give to persistent borrowers of books, implements, etc., who keep them a long time and sometimes do not return them at all. Is this a case in which we should "do good and lend, hoping for nothing again" (Luke 6:35)?

The best answer to give such borrowers must vary according to circumstances. I attempt at recovery of every article so procured, as a matter of principle and reproof; third, stern yet loving rebuke at each manifestation of such an unworthy spirit; fourth, refusal to encourage such species of dishonesty by decided refusal of request, plainly stating the reason. You should not wish others to favor such evil habits in yourself and should not yourself indulge them in theirs. Your whole influence must be against it.

WALTER W. HUBBARD.

4. Is a pastor justified in urging his people to vote a certain political ticket at the elections?

We think a pastor is never justified in urging his people to vote at all, much less for any party. We see no Scripture warrant for this. Christ never hints at any instruction in this matter, nor do we find anything regarding it in any part of the New Testament. The only directions as to the Christian's relation to government are that he shall obey the law, pray for rulers, pay his taxes and keep separate from the world. His citizenship—(politeuma—politics), is in heaven, and he cannot be a citizen of two countries at the same time. He can do the most good in this world by preaching Christ and snatching men out of the world. This seems like strange doc-

The Record of Sixty Years of Consecrated Labor by the Baptists in the Domestic Field

DR. ROBERT G. SEYMOUR

Evidently, the work of planting Sunday Schools is one that yields a sure and quick return for the labor and money invested. Our readers have taken a deep interest in this branch of the American Sunday School Union's work for many years, they will therefore be glad to hear of another organization, which has done highly successful work on the same lines.

As far back as the year 1840, the American Baptist Publication Society, which had for sixteen years been doing vigorous work in the circulation of Bibles, tracts and religious literature, resolved "to promote Sunday Schools by such measures as experience may prove expedient." So energetically has this resolution been carried into effect, that in the sixty-one years which have since elapsed, no less than 11,935 Sunday Schools have been organized through its efforts. It was soon found that the two spheres of labor aided one another. The profits on the business done by the publication department aided in the support of Sunday School missionaries, and a direct help was given to the new schools by the books which were granted to form a library. On the other hand, the organization of a Sunday School encouraged reading and increased the demand for books. Besides this, there is the tendency, especially in country districts, of the Sunday School to develop into a church, and in this way a large number of Baptist churches have originated.

An important service to the schools organized by the Society is the Institutes which are regularly conducted. In opening up new territory the Sunday School missionary must work with such material as is accessible. He is able, as a rule, to induce earnest Christians to serve as teachers, but it frequently happens that their readiness to undertake the work is greater than their capacity. Some are deficient in knowledge and many have no aptitude for teaching. To remedy these defects the Institutes have been organized, which prepare the teacher for his work. More than five hundred of these are held every year, with the result that the teachers become familiar, not only with the lessons, but with the best pedagogic methods of imparting knowledge. The holding of the Institute has become an important branch of the Sunday School missionary's work, and it has proved so effective an aid, that the Publication Society has now under consideration a proposal to establish a National Institute, which shall direct the studies of teachers orally or by correspondence and grant diplomas for proficiency. This is one step in the direction of solving the much-discussed problem of providing trained teachers for the Sunday School.

The Missionary and Sunday School work of the Publication Society is under the charge of Dr. R. G. Seymour, whose portrait appears on this page. Among the zealous missionaries in the field are: Rev. Silas X. Floyd in Alabama and Georgia; Mr. Ernest Fagstrom in Minnesota; Rev. G. Melby among the Swedes of the same State; Mr. Wilson A. Holmes in Ohio; Mr. Charles Rhoads in Missouri; Rev. Carl Oberg in Iowa and Nebraska, and Mr. J. L. Rupard in Oklahoma. Their work has been greatly extended and facilitated by the introduction of the Chapel Car and the Gospel Wagon. Time was when, as the name "Colporteur" indicates, the bearer of Gospel literature tramped through the country bearing his stock slung hoped they would be with the heels pointed toward her door. He did leave some tracts but they were pointed heavenward as it proved in the end. These humble, earnest workers have left their tracts in many an isolated district and the seed they sowed has been nurtured by the Sunday School missionary and has developed into churches. In some instances the Sunday School has preceded even the saloon, and, as one of the workers remarked, it was an achievement to be proud of to get ahead of the saloon, in any way.

It is ten years since the inauguration by the Publication Society of that department of work which is known as the Chapel Car Work. The first car was named Emmanuel. It was an experiment at the outset, but it soon proved its utility. The railroads welcomed it, and one after another gave it free passage over their lines. A profane utterance of a man, who was puzzled by the first appearance of the car in his neighborhood, proved true. He asked what the car meant, and being told that it was a church and parsonage combined, said that he had seen sleeping-cars, cattle cars and all kinds of cars, but a church car beat the devil. "Yes," said the missionary, who overheard the remark, "it does, and that was what it was built for." So successful was it that cars numbered two, three, four, five and six were built in rapid succession at an aggregate cost of one hundred thousand dollars, and have carried the glad tidings of salvation over thousands of miles of tracks. Through this agency alone, one hundred and eighty-two Sunday Schools have been organized in districts in which no religious service was held, and at the Gospel meetings held in the cars over two thousand persons have been brought to make confession of Christ. An illustration of the usefulness of the chapel car occurred not long ago at Bird's Point, Mo. No religious service had been held in the locality, but when the chapel car was run on to the siding, curiosity brought an audience together. Mr. and Mrs. Neil, the missionaries on board, presented the Gospel in a forcible way, and the people were impressed. Larger audiences came on the following evenings, and before the car resumed its journey a Baptist church, with thirty members, had been organized. The car has been instrumental, also, in preparing revivals. In one week's journey in Michigan, neighborhoods were visited in which the churches were weak and lifeless. The singing and the earnest preaching so stirred the people that a new impetus was given to religious work, and over fifty persons were added to the membership of the churches.

The Society recently celebrated its seventy-seventh anniversary at Springfield, Mass. The various reports showed that its venerable age in no sense implies senility or feebleness. Its manifold operations are, on the contrary, indications of increased energy and remarkable enterprise in reaching districts and classes untouched by others. As in other societies, the chief need is one of funds for the almost unlimited development of its work.

around his neck. Both the colporteur and the missionary have reason to bless the better times on which their lot has fallen. The Publication Society has now eighteen Gospel Wagons in the field, and it proposes to continue its efforts until there is a Gospel Wagon in every State and Territory. Thousands of remote homes have been reached by this agency, which must have remained untouched by the pedestrian workers. The results of the agency are beyond computation. A speaker at the recent anniversary of the Society told how a colporteur in a remote settlement asked permission to leave some tracts. The good woman whom he addressed misunderstood him, and bluntly replied, that if he left any tracks around her home, she

Bad Habits Conquered

TEXT--Prov. 23: 35:

When shall I awake? I will seek it yet again

WITH an insight into human nature, such as no other man ever had, Solomon in these words is sketching the mental processes of a man who has stepped aside from the path of rectitude and would like to return. Wishing for something better, he says: "When shall I awake? When shall I get over this horrible nightmare of iniquity?" But seized upon by uneradicated appetite and pushed down hill by his passions, he cries out: "I will seek it yet again. I will try it once more!"

About a mile from Princeton, N. J., there is a skating pond. One winter day, when the ice was very thin, a farmer living near by warned the young men of the danger of skating at that time. They all took the warning except one young man. He, in the spirit of bravado, said: "Boys, one round more." He struck out on his skates, the ice broke, and his lifeless body was brought up. And in all matters of temptation and allurements it is not a prolongation that is proposed, but only just one more indulgence, just one more sin. Then comes the fatality. Alas, for the one round more! "I will seek it yet again."

Our libraries are adorned with elegant literature addressed to young men, pointing out to them all the dangers and perils of life. Complete maps of the voyage of life—the shoals, the rocks, the quicksands. But suppose a young man is already shipwrecked, suppose he is already off the track, suppose he has already gone astray, how can he get back? That is a question that remains unanswered, and amid all the books of the libraries I find not one word on that subject. To that class of persons I this day address myself.

You compare what you are now with what you were three or four years ago, and you are greatly disheartened. You are ready with every passion of your soul to listen to a discussion like this. Be of good cheer! Your best days are yet to come. I offer you the hand of welcome and rescue. I put the silver trumpet of the Gospel to my lips and blow one long, loud blast, saying: "Whosoever will, let him come, and let him come now." The church of God is ready to spread a banquet upon your return, and all the hierarchs of heaven fall into line of bannered procession over your redemption.

Years ago, and while yet Albert Barnes was living, I preached in his pulpit one night to the young men of Philadelphia. In the opening of my discourse, I said: "O, Lord, give me one soul to-night!" At the close of the service Mr. Barnes introduced a young man, saying: "This is the young man you prayed for." But I see now it was a too limited prayer. I offer no such prayer to-day. It must take in a wider sweep. "Lord, give us all these souls to-day, for happiness and heaven!"

Obstacles to be Overcome

So far as God may help me, I propose to show what are the obstacles to your return, and then how you are to surmount those obstacles. The first difficulty in the way of your return is the force of moral gravitation. Just as there is a natural law which brings down to earth anything you throw into the air, so there is a corresponding moral gravitation. I never shall forget a prayer I heard a young man make in the Young Men's Christian Association of New York. With trembling voice and streaming eyes, he said: "Oh, God, thou knowest how easy it is for me to do wrong, and how hard it is for me to do right. God help me!" That man knows not his own heart who has never felt the power of moral gravitation.

In your boyhood you had good associates and bad associates. Which most impressed you? During the last few years you have heard pure anecdotes and impure anecdotes. Which the easiest stuck to your memory? You have had good habits and bad habits. To which did your soul more easily yield? But that moral gravitation may be resisted. Just as you may pick up anything from the earth and hold it in your hand toward heaven, just so, by the power of God's grace, a fallen soul may be lifted toward peace, toward pardon, toward salvation. The force of moral gravitation is in every one of us, but also power in God's grace to overcome that force.

The next thing in the way of your return is the power of evil habit. I know there are those who say it is very easy for them to give up evil habits. I cannot believe them. Here is a man given to intoxication, who knows it is disgracing his family, destroying his property, and ruining him—body, mind and soul. If that man, being an intelligent man and loving his family, could easily give up that habit, would he not do so? The fact that he does not give it up proves that it is hard to give it up. It is a very easy thing to sail down stream, the tide carrying you with great force; but suppose you turn the boat upstream, is it so easy then to row it? As long as we yield to the evil inclinations in our heart and to our bad habits, we are sailing down stream, but the moment we try to turn, we put our boat in the rapids just above Niagara and try to row upstream.

A Smoker's Ordeal

A physician tells his patient that he must quit the use of tobacco, as it is destroying his health. The man replies: "I can stop that habit easy enough." He quits the use of the weed. He goes around not knowing what to do with himself. He cannot add up a column of figures; he cannot sleep nights. It seems as if the world had turned upside down. He feels his business is going to ruin. Where he was kind and obliging he is scolding and fretful. The composure that characterized him has given way to a fretful restlessness, and he has become a complete fidget. What power is it that has rolled a wave of woe over the earth and shaken a portent in the heavens? He has quit tobacco. After a while he says: "I am going to do as I please; the doctor does not understand my case. I am going back to my old habits." And he returns. Everything assumes its usual composure. His business seems to brighten. The world becomes an attractive place to live in. His children, seeing the difference, hail the return of their father's genial disposition. What wave of color has dashed blue into the sky, and greenness into the mountain foliage, and the glow of sapphire into the sunset? What enchantment has lifted a world of beauty and joy on his soul? He has resumed tobacco.

The fact is, we all know in our own experience that habit is a taskmaster. As long as we obey it, it does not chastise us; but let us resist, and we find that we are lashed with scorpion whips, and bound with ship cable, and thrown into the track of bone-breaking juggernauts.

Suppose a man of five or ten or twenty years of evil-doing resolves to do right, why all the forces of darkness are allied against him? He gets down on his knees in the midnight and cries: "God help me!" He bites his lip. He grinds his teeth. He clinches his fist in a determination to keep to his purpose. He dare not look at the bottles in the window of a wine store. It is one long, bitter, with inflamed, tantalizing, merciless habit. When he thinks he is entirely free, the old inclination pounces upon him like a pack of hounds, all their muzzles tearing away at the flanks of one poor reindeer.

Exhaustive, Hand-to-Hand Fight

In Paris there is a sculptured representation of Bacchus, the god of revelry. He is riding on a panther at full leap. Oh, how suggestive! Let every one who is speeding on bad ways understand he is not riding a docile and well-broken steed, but that he is riding a monster wild and bloodthirsty and going at a death leap.

I have also to say if a man wants to return from evil practices society repulses him. The prodigal, wishing to return, tries to take some professor of religion by the hand. The professor of religion looks at him—looks at the faded apparel and the marks of dissipation—and instead of giving him a firm grip of the hand, offers him the tip-end of the longer fingers of the left hand, which is equal to striking a man in the face. Oh, how few Christian people understand how much Gospel there is in a good, honest handshaking! Sometimes when you have felt the need of encouragement, and some Christian man has taken you heartily by the hand, have you not felt thrilling through every fibre of your body, mind, and soul an encouragement that was just what you needed?

The prodigal wishing to get into good society, enters a prayer-meeting. Some good man without much sense greets him by saying: "Why! are you here? You are about the last person that I expected to see in a prayer-meeting. Well, the dying thief was saved, and there is hope for you." You do not know anything about this, unless you have learned that when a man tries to return from evil courses of conduct he runs against repulsions innumerable.

We say of some man, "He lives a block or two from the church, or half a mile from the church." In all our great cities there are men who are five thousand miles from church—vast deserts of indifference between them and the house of God. The fact is, we must keep our respectability, though thousands perish. Christ sat with publicans and sinners, but if there come to the house of God a man with marks of dissipation upon him, people are almost sure to put up their hands in horror and turn away their faces, as much as to say "Is it not shocking?"

How these dainty, fastidious Christians in all our churches are going to get into heaven I do not know, unless they have an especial train of cars cushioned and upholstered, each one a car to himself. They cannot go with the great herd of publicans and sinners. (Ye who curl your lip of scorn on the fallen! I tell you plainly that if you had been surrounded by the same influences, instead of sitting to-day amid the cultured, the refined, and the Christian, you might have been crouching wretch in stable or ditch covered with filth and abomination. It is not because we are natural any better, but because the mercy of God has protected us. Those that are brought up in Christian circles and watched by Christian parentage should not be so hard on the fallen.

Hindered by Non-Essentials

I think, also, that men are often hindered from turning, by the fact that churches are anxious about their membership, too anxious about their denominations, and they rush out when they see a man about to give up sin and return to God, and ask him how he is going to be baptized—whether by sprinkling or immersion—and what kind of a church he is going to join. It is a poor time to talk about Presbyterian catechism and Episcopal liturgies, and Methodist love feasts, and Baptist immersions, when a man is about to come out of the darkness of sin into the glorious light of the Gospel.

Why, it reminds me of a man drowning in the sea and a lifeboat puts out for him, and the man in the boat says to the man in the water: "Now, if I get you ashore are you going to live in my street?" First, get him ashore, and then talk to him about the non-essentials of religion. Who cares what church he joins, if he only joins Christ and starts for heaven? O, you, brother of illumined face and a hearty grip for every one that tries to turn from his evil way! take hold of the same hymn-book with him, though his dissipation shake the book, remembering that he that "converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins."

Now, I have shown you these obstacles because I want you to understand I know all the difficulties in the way. But I am now going to tell you how Hannibal may scale the Alps, and how the shackles may be unriveted, and how the paths of virtue forsaken may be regained. First of all, throw yourself on God. Go to him frankly and earnestly and tell him these habits you have, and ask him, if there is any help in all the sources of omnipotent love, to give it to you. Do not go on with a long rigmarole, which some people call prayer, made up of ohs and ahs, and forever-and-ever, amens. Go to God and cry for help.

I remember that in the Civil War I was at Antietam with other members of the Christian commission, and look after the wounded. I went into the hospital after the battle, and I said to a man: "Where are you hurt? He made no answer, but held up his arm, swollen and splintered. I saw where he was hurt. The simple fact is, when a man has a wounded soul all he has to do is to hold it up before a sympathetic Lord and get healed. It does not take any long prayer. Just hold up the wound. It is no small thing, when a man is nervous and weak and exhausted, coming from his evil ways, to feel that God puts around him and says: "I will stand by you. The mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but I will never fail you." And then, as the soul thinks the new is too good to be true and cannot believe it, and look up in God's face, God lifts his right hand and takes an affidavit, makes an oath, saying: "As I live," saith the Lord God, "I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked." Blessed be God for such Gospel as this! "C the slices thin," says the wife to the husband, "for the will not be enough to go around for all the children; c the slices thin." Blessed be God, there is a full loaf for every one that wants it. Bread and enough to spare. No thin slices on the Lord's table!

I remember that while living in Philadelphia, at the time I spoke of a minute ago, the Master Street Hospital was opened and a telegram was received, saying "There will be 300 wounded men to-night. Please take care of them." From my church there went out twenty or thirty men and women. As the poor wounded men were brought in no one asked them from what State they came or what was their parentage. There was a wounded soldier, and the only question, was how to take off the rags most gently and put on the cool bandage.

le and administer the cordial. And when a soul comes to God, he does not ask where you came from or what your ancestry was. Healing balm for all your wounds; pardon for all your guilt; comfort for all your troubles.

Then, also, I counsel you, if you want to get back, let all your bad associates. One unholy intimacy will ruin your soul with moral distemper. In all the ages of the Church, there has not been an instance where a man left one evil associate and was reformed—among the seven hundred million of the race, not one instance. Give up your bad companions or give up heaven. It is ten bad companions that destroy a man, nor five bad companions, nor three, but one.

What chance is there for that young man I saw along the street, four or five young men with him, in front of a drug shop, urging him to go in, he resisting, violently resisting, until after a while they forced him to go in? Was it a summer night, and the door was left open, and he saw the process. They held him fast, and they put a cup to his lips, and they forced down the strong drink. What chance is there for such a young man? I counsel you also to seek Christian advice. Every Christian man is bound to help you. If he declines to help you he is not a Christian. Now gather up all your energies of body, mind and soul and, appealing to God for success, declare this day everlasting war against all evil influences. A half-and-half work will amount to nothing; it must be a Waterloo. Shrink back now and you are lost. Push on and you are saved. Spartan general fell at the very moment of victory, he dipped his finger in his own blood and wrote on the rock near which he was dying, "Sparta has conquered." Though your struggle to get rid of sin may seem to be almost a death struggle, you can dip your finger in your own blood and write on the Rock of Ages, "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Some of you, like myself, were born in the country. What glorious news might these young men send me to their parents, that this afternoon they had surrendered themselves to God and started a new life! I know how it is in the country. The night comes on. The cattle stand under the rack, through which burst the trusses of hay. The horses have just frisked up in the meadow brook at the nightfall and stand deep in the bright straw that invites them to lie down and rest. The perch of the hovel is full of fowl, their feet warm under their feathers. When the night is cold the flames clap their hands above the great log and shake the shadow of the group up and down the wall. Father and mother sit there for half an hour, saying nothing. I wonder what they are thinking of. After a while the father breaks the silence and says, "Well, I wonder where our boy is in town to-night?" And the mother answers, "In no bad place, I trust you. We always could trust him when he was home, and since he has been away there have been many prayers offered for him we can trust him still." Then at 8 or 9 o'clock, just before they retire, for they go early to bed, they kneel down and commend you to that God who watches in country and in town, on the land and on the sea.

Some one said to a Grecian general: "What was the proudest moment of your life?" He thought a moment, and said: "The proudest moment was when I sent word home to my parents that I had gained the victory." And the gladdest and most brilliant moment in your life will be the moment when you can send word to your parents that you have conquered the evil habits by the grace of God, and become eternal victor.

Oh, despise not parental anxiety! The time will come when you will have neither father nor mother, and you will go around the place where they used to watch you, and find them gone from the house and gone from the field and gone from the neighborhood. Cry as loud for forgiveness as you may over the mound in the churchyard, they cannot answer. Dead! Dead! And then you will take out the white lock of hair that was cut from mother's brow just before they buried her, and you will take the cane with which your father used to walk, and you will think and think, and wish that you had done just as they wanted you, and would give the world if you had never thrust a pang through their dear old hearts.

God pity the young man who has brought disgrace on his father's name! God pity the young man who has broken his mother's heart! Better that he had never been born. Better if in the first hour of his life, instead of being laid against the warm bosom of maternal tenderness, he had been confined and sepulchred. There is no balm powerful enough to heal the heart of one who has brought parents to a sorrowful grave, and who wanders about through the dismal cemetery rending the air and wringing the hands and crying, "Mother! Mother!" Oh, that to-day, by all the memories of the past, and by all the hopes of the future, you would yield your heart to God! May your father's God and your mother's God be your God forever!

This hour the door of mercy swings wide open. Hesitate not a moment. In many a case hesitation is the loss of all. At the corner of a street I saw a tragedy. A young man evidently doubted as to which direction he had better take. His hat was lifted high enough so you could see he had an intelligent forehead. He had a stout chest and a robust development. Splendid young man! Cultured young man! Honored young man! Why did he stop there while so many were going up and down? The fact is, that every young man has a good angel and a bad angel contending for the mastery of his spirit, and there were a good angel and a bad angel struggling with that young man's soul at the corner of the street. "Come with me," said the good angel; "I will take you home. I will spread my wings over your pillow. I will lovingly escort you all through life under supernatural protection. I will bless every cup you drink out of, every couch you rest on, every doorway you enter. I will consecrate your tears when you weep, your sweat when you toil, and at the last I will hand over your grave into the hand of the bright angel of a Christian resurrection. I have been sent of the Lord to be your guardian spirit. Come with me," said the good angel in a voice of unearthly symphony. It was music like that which drops from a lute of heaven when a seraph breathes on it.

"Oh, no," said the bad angel; "come with me. I have something better to offer. The wines I pour are from chalices of bewitching carousal. The dance I lead is over floors tessellated with unrestrained indulgence. There is no God to frown on the temples of sin where I worship. The skies are Italian. The paths I tread are through meadows daisied and primrosed. Come with me!"

The young man hesitated at a time when hesitation was ruin, and the bad angel smote the good angel until it departed, spreading wings through the starlight, upward and away, until a door swung open in the sky, and forever the wings vanished. That was the turning point in that young man's history, for, the good angel flown, he hesitated no longer, but started on a pathway which is beautiful at the opening, but blasted at the last. The bad angel led the way through gate after gate, and at each gate the road became rougher and the sky more lurid, and, what was peculiar, as the gate slammed shut it came to with a jar that indicated it would never open. Past each portal there was a grinding of locks and a shoving of the bolts, and the scenery on each side the road changed from gardens to deserts, and the June air became a cutting December blast, and the bright wings of the bad angel turned to sackcloth, and the fountains that at the start had tossed with wine, poured forth bubbling tears of foaming blood. And on the right side of the road there was a serpent, and the man said to the bad angel: "What is that serpent?" and the answer was: "That is the serpent of stinging remorse." On the left side of the road there was a lion, and the man asked the bad angel: "What is that lion?" The answer was: "That is the lion of all-devouring despair." A vulture flew through the sky, and the man asked the bad angel: "What is that vulture?" The answer was: "That is the vulture waiting for the carcasses of the slain."

And then the man said to the bad angel: "What does all this mean? I trusted in what you said at the street corner; I trusted it all. Why have you thus deceived me?" Then the last deception fell off the charmer, and he said: "I was sent from the pit to destroy your soul. I watched my chance for many a long year. When you hesitated that night at the street corner I gained my triumph. Now you are here. Ha! Ha! You are here! Come, now, let us fill the chalice and drink to darkness and woe and death. Hail! Hail!"

Oh, young man! will the good angel sent forth by Christ or the bad angel sent forth by sin get the victory over your soul? Their wings are interlocked this moment above you, contending for your soul, as above the Apennines eagle and condor fight mid-sky. This hour decides eternal destinies.

.. MISS STONE'S BULGARIAN BIBLE-WOMEN ..

THE grief among the Bulgarian Bible-women over the captivity of Miss Ellen M. Stone is greater than we, at this distance, can realize. Miss Stone is a sympathizing friend, as well as an earnest teacher, entering into all their trials, rejoicing over their victories, proud of their spiritual children. They seem to be stuff martyrs are made of—these native converts. Miss Stone tells of one whose husband drove her forth from his home and from her children because of her faith, recalling her when he found he could not do without her, only, however, to beat and otherwise maltreat her. He could not shake her calm. When he threatened to kill her, she said, "I shall be the sooner go to God." By faithful prayer and gentleness she won the victory. He became one with her in Christ. Miss Stone writes thus of one of her band of Bible-women gathered around her at their annual conference at Makov:

It is a small thing that in a village where a young girl is the only worker, there being no teacher, ten souls should have been added to the church at the communion which marked the close of her year of work? Her success will not be wondered at when we learn that willing she was to do anything by means of which she might be able to reach some soul. Passing through a village street one day, and seeing a woman at a window in the second story of a house, salutations passed between them; encouraged by the woman's earnestness, she inquired if she would like to come to the house and thought she could not; but here was a soul to be taught. By the help of a neighboring branch and the man's hand, she climbed into the window.

MISS STONE (CENTRE) AND A TRAINING CLASS OF BULGARIAN BIBLE-WOMEN

The visit was repeated until the fearful inquirer became the fearless disciple of Christ, and six or seven other souls in the same yard became his followers.

She says of another:

Comparatively late in life, a widowed daughter-in-law in a proud old Macedonian family was brought into the fold of Christ.

Griefs had broken her heart, and the balm of Christian sympathy came most sweetly to her spirit. Persecutions came. Her own children would not have her in their homes, though their pride forbade them to leave her to suffer for material necessities. Her trials only drew her nearer to the Lord. How she worked among the society ladies who had been her former friends! Only the last great day will reveal how many stars she won for her crown during her short but full Christian life. Blessed Baba Sebastia! Her lamp was trimmed and burning when her summons came to rise and meet her Lord.

There was Stepha, the first assistant in her touring work, accomplished, gentle and winning, who made many converts, among them Katrinka, who under Lady Strongford's patronage, was fitted for a trained nurse, and afterwards, in this capacity and as a Bible-woman, found ready access to rich Turkish homes. Her latest assistant, Mme. Tsilka, won the love and admiration of all with whom she was thrown when in this country. So successful was she in surgery that the Turkish Government sought to engage her services, giving her the salary of a medical officer. But she declined; she would rather, she said, work for the Master and for the poor. Her husband, Rev. Mr. Tsilka, like herself, won many friends in this country; and his classmates at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, express the deepest sympathy for him.

There are indications that the brigands who abducted Miss Stone and Mme. Tsilka have been thoroughly frightened by the storm their outrage has stirred up, and are now ready to surrender their prisoner. They are now represented as being more anxious to save their own heads than to exact ransom; but it is still believed by our own State Department that the ransom will have to be paid in order to make Miss Stone's safe release absolutely certain. It is probable that Turkey and Bulgaria will not only be ultimately compelled to refund any ransom that may be paid, but that punitive damages will be demanded by our Government. Both of these claims Turkey is preparing to resist.

THE CHAPEL FIRESIDE

THE OLD COLONIAL MANSION, WHERE HOMELESS MEN FIND SHELTER

B. M. B. MILLER

THE OPEN HEARTH

HARTFORD'S UNIQUE RESCUE MISSION

ONLY a street back from the Connecticut River, at Hartford, stands a unique rescue mission, founded thirteen years ago by a converted infidel. The building is an ancient colonial mansion; one hundred and thirty-five years ago it was the finest in Hartford. From its three great, old-fashioned hearths, and the use which was to be made of the place, it received the name of "The Open Hearth," at the time the mission was first established there.

For thirteen years the glow and cheer of "The Open Hearth" has welcomed wandering, wayward and unfortunate men. No matter how broken in body or spirit a man may be, there is a cordial word and a brotherly hand-clasp for him here, if he is willing to try to work his way to better things. Even though he came from a jail or prison "the string is always on the latch." The past is ignored. The superintendent believes that hanging on to the past holds a man back from any high achievement. He discourages in his rescued men all allusion to the old life of sin, and seeks to have them "forgetting those things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those things that are before . . . press towards the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ."

For the man, however, who is not in earnest there is no room. The persistent tippler, the shiftless idler must make place for those who use opportunities, and who seek to help themselves.

Over twenty men saved at "The Open Hearth" are now trusted employees of business firms, receiving salaries ranging from $1,000 to $1,500. Some who came direct on release from prison to this mission are filling such situations. One of these, whom to any but the eye of faith it seemed impossible to save,—"not worth the saving," some said,—holds to-day a responsible position drawing $1,800 salary. Superintendent Miller visits the jails once a week and sees personally all discharged prisoners. The year's record shows 700 prisoners who came for advice and prayer to "The Open Hearth;" 500 helped in material as well as spiritual ways. Last year 13,148 men were lodged at ten and fifteen cents a night; 20,401 meals were served at five cents each—less than cost, of course. Attendance at Gospel services was 24,760; 100 men openly accepted the Master, demonstrating by their lives an actual change of heart. Two of the mission's rescued sons who have passed over the river to the Home beyond, left bequests—$1,000 and $3,000, respectively, to "The Open Hearth" as evidence of their gratitude and affectionate interest. A big wood cellar furnishes employment for inmates. Four hours' work per day secures a man his board and lodging, leaving him time in which to seek other work.

A TYPICAL WOOD-YARD SCENE

Every night, when Gospel service and prayers are over, the "Hearth" quiets down for slumber. Often in winter, after the cots are all filled, forty or fifty men, for whom beds cannot be found, crowd around the hearth in the Reading Room; and a man keeps a big fire roaring all night; and weary wayfarers sleep on the tables, chairs and floor—for none are sent out into the cold.

The work is undenominational, and has the active sympathy and support of all the evangelical churches of the city. The outside forms of aid to the poor are many. For instance, the Superintendent buys coal in summer in 500 ton lots and sells it in winter to needy homes at actual cost. If a child brings an order for coal, he will not accept it where there is a man in the family. One of his reasons for pursuing this course is that it gives him a chance to talk to the men, and thus do them perhaps, a lasting good.

"The Open Hearth" is very popular with all the children in the neighborhood. A yard, provided with big sandpiles, furnishes a playground for all the boys and girls around. A special service is held on Thursday evenings for them. These services attract many newsboys, who are fond of Mr. Miller and "The Open Hearth" playground. Mr. Miller has a great liking for little folks, and loves to gather the children in. After the bright, spirited songs with which the services are opened, he interests his youthful audience in stories of the Christian life. He is a writer of children's stories, and has turned a happy turn for holding the attention of little folks. The Apostle's Creed and the Lord's Prayer form a part of every service, and always at the close, each girl and boy receives a picture illustrating some scene in the life of Christ. The superintendent believes in preventive work and is seeking honestly to bring the children to the Master.

An article about "The Open Hearth" would be incomplete without giving the story of its founder. B. M. B. Miller was born in Windsor, Conn., in 1868, and came to Hartford when seventeen years old. A year later, he was converted in an Episcopal church, by a sermon by Bishop Nichols, now of California. Though by eighteen, he was an agnostic. He had been reading infidel books and had come imbued with their scepticism.

his prayer had been: "O God, if there be a God, reveal to me the truth." With his conversion, his whole life changed. He took out of his trunk a little Bible his mother had placed in it and began to study God's Word with faith. At the same time he began to try to help others in the Recreation Rooms of Christ's Church. Then came larger work described above.

AN EASTERN "TELLER OF TALES"

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

IN every land and age, civilized and otherwise, the raconteur has a function which possesses a peculiar fascination for many minds. In our own country, the person who can effectively relate some incident that has both point and striking interest, is pretty certain to be sure of a welcome, whether on the platform or in the social circle. His prototype is found in the professional story-teller of the Orient—a functionary whose art and pleasing skill have held the ear of kings and courts and other listeners almost from the beginnings of time. The "remembrancers" who, by the recital of the events of former days, soothed the sleepless hours of kings, the court poets, minstrels and "tellers of tales," all belonged to this class of professional entertainers, although it should not be forgotten that the "remembrancers," or recorders, were really the historians of facts, and not of imaginary happenings, as might well be suspected of the others.

Travelers in the Eastern countries, particularly in Arabia and Persia, still encounter the "teller of tales," and yield to the fascinations of his quaint world-old narratives, which may be related either before a company of guests or by the bedside of some dignitary or some specially honored visitor. Our correspondent at Urmi, Persia (Mrs. Hannah Yoseph Jacob), in one of her recent letters, describing a visit to a Kurdish lady, tells how one of these story-tellers (a woman) soothed her to sleep by her droning recital of some of the old Kurdish folk-lore legends and tales of the nursery sort. Abdurrahman Khan, the late ruler of Afghanistan (who passed away last month), was accustomed to having a native story-teller sit by the royal couch almost nightly and lull him to sleep with the stories of Afghan prowess in the "days of old." This ruler did not specially value the tales on account of any literary or dramatic merit, but took them purely as a sleep-inducer, and so convinced was he of their potency as a soporific that, when he "dropped off," the tired professional was relieved by another of the same class, who kept up the "tale of wonder" in a monotonous, sing-song throughout the night, Abdurrahman declaring that the drone of the man's voice made him sleep soundly, and was essential to his comfort. His "teller of tales" quitted regularly at daybreak.

In the photograph on the first page, an old Arab, who may be either a professional reader or a scribe, has a pair of deeply interested auditors, who are following every word that comes from his lips. It may be a letter from Bagdad, Teheran, or Tabriz, a "gazette" from some still more distant part of the Orient, or possibly a modern version of some old tale, or fragment of Eastern folk-lore. The dress and surroundings of the trio are such as the traveler may see in Damascus, Cairo, Beirut, and many other cities, where the "high and drive" of occidental life have not influenced the population. Time still moves slowly among the ruins of the Orient.

Off to Win Souls in Heathen Africa

A Party of American Missionaries, of the Africa Inland Mission, Sail for Kangundu, E. A.

ON the morning of Saturday, Oct. 26, there sailed from the port of New York, on the Atlantic Transport liner, Menominee, for London, a party of eleven persons, six of them being adults and five children. They were a group of missionaries, of the Africa Inland Mission, bound for the foreign field. The party includes the Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt, of Philadelphia, Founder of the Pennsylvania Institute and Director of the Africa Inland Mission, his wife and five children; the Rev. Lee H. Downing, and wife, of Philadelphia (where Mr. Downing has been a teacher in the Institute); and Dr. Henderson, a former medical missionary on the west coast of Africa. The twelfth figure in the photograph is that of a friend who is not of the party. Proceeding to Amsterdam, they will be joined by Miss Lily Messenger, a native of Wiesbaden, Germany, who has spent several years in Philadelphia as an Institute student. They will sail from Amsterdam on the steamer Gouverneur, of the German East Africa line, their port of destination being Mombasa. From that port they proceed inland by rail for over 200 miles, to a point where they will be transported to bullock-wagons or some similar conveyances, in which they will travel forty miles further, to Kangundu, their final destination. Kangundu, in British East Africa, is some 325 miles inland from Mombasa, and a station which was established there by the Africa Inland Mission several years ago, is vigorous and thriving. There are three white Christian male teachers there at present conducting the work, but no white woman has ever been seen in the mission station or in that part of African territory. Mrs. Hurlburt, Dr. Downing and Miss Messenger, therefore be pioneers in their own peculiar field of spiritual labor among the native women of the country. Few of the missionaries from the history of consecrated missionary effort in heathen lands are more interesting or instructive than those that tell of the founding and growth of the Africa Inland Mission. Established on purely undenominational lines five or six years ago, it has already been abundantly blessed and its work has expanded year by year. Doubtless some of our readers will recall the account, which appeared in these pages in 1896, of the expedition undertaken by Dr. P. Cameron Scott and a party of American and English missionaries in East Africa, and the opening of the first mission station at Nzawi. In that party were three men and five women. On reaching Mombasa, the women were left there, while the men went forward to select a mission site in the interior. They chose a hill overlooking the beautiful Kaji Valley, and there, while returning to Mombasa. On February 3, 1897, Dr. Scott, with two of his ladies and a caravan of men, set out for the interior, reaching Nzawi, on February 28. Soon another station was opened at Sakai, and a third at Kilungu. Kangundu station was next opened, and the first experience there proved an exceedingly rough one, by reason of a native rebellion against the British which raged about that time. Thus, within ten months after opening the first station, four stations had been only established. Six of brick buildings and a dozen grass buildings were erected in that time, and also houses for men, chickens and goats. The soil had been tilled, and crops of potatoes, wheat, barley, and corn and oats started. Fortunately the climate at all the stations is a healthy one, and the heat is unendurable.

Concerning the work at the stations, Dr. Scott wrote as follows: "Our school work has not been large, but carried on faithfully since its inception in March. The school is composed of boys from various sections of this great continent; for the Africans are a migratory people. One boy is from far distant Unyoro, another from Mangu in the south, two from Nyamwezi, one from Zanzibar, who has traveled all over the Congo, one from the Soudan, the others being from our own districts. Several of these boys are supported in school by friends in America. My sister does not report these boys as being exceptionally bright, but faithful. They make splendid vocalists, and have phenomenal memories. Another branch of our work has been that of the dispensary, and this has been attended with many good results.

Our work has been distinctively that of pioneering, and we have been working at a great disadvantage, owing to the fact that we knew nothing of the language of the people among whom we have come to labor. Many of us have had much cause for thankfulness in the matter of health.

And now a word might be said about the people among

We have had times of trial; also times of blessing and times of sorrow; but also times of joy; patience has been put to the test, but God has answered prayer; our need in every particular has been very great; but his promise has not failed. Our hearts are full of thanksgiving for all the marvels of his grace.

The American headquarters of the Africa Inland Mission are at No. 516 Stephen Girard Building, Philadelphia.

Church Building in Heathen Africa

In a letter from a missionary of the M. E. Mission at Umtali, South East Africa, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writer says:

"I am sending you a photograph showing our new native church, in process of construction. When we arrived here (less than six months ago), we found that nothing was being done for the hundreds of natives in this place; so, after looking to God for his blessing, we hired six natives and went into the forest and cut sticks and poles, and began to build. Rev. Mr. Ehnes assisted in putting on the roof. The missionary must be resourceful. Now, regular services are being held here every Sunday afternoon. God's Spirit is working in the hearts and minds of the natives. There are several cases of conversion, and we expect to baptize several before the end of the year. My wife has a class of forty boys. She began with the alphabet, and now some of them can read in the New Testament. The church is to be dedicated next month by Bishop Hartzell, who will be here to organize the East Equatorial Conference.

"We are expecting to make plans for a general forward movement, with a Central Africa as the objective point. We need the prayers and sympathy of God's children in the great work we are attempting for the Master."

On Custer's Battlefield

It was a picture full of meaning (writes a correspondent in The American Missionary) to see a group of Indian girls gathered on the heights of Custer's last battlefield to strew flowers over the mouldering remains of those who fell there. As one looks from the monument over the ridges near and far, dotted with the little white tombstones of the soldiers, the whole scene of the battle is spread out before the eye. Eastward are the billowy ridges over which Custer's troops urged their tired horses in the early morning. To the south-east lie the valleys, which were dotted with lodges and swarming with life. Beyond were the crowded villages, most of which Custer could not see through the willows and cottonwoods fringing the stream. Among those who fought against our army there was "Yellow Earrings," one of Sitting Bull's warriors and his follower to the last. Long ago he went back to his old Dakota home. As these lines are written, this word comes from our missionary there: "The work among the old people is such a blessed work. These old Indians have such strength of character as only the chase and war could develop—tender and kind of heart, fearless and strong. I called upon an old man, Yellow Earrings, to pray at our meeting. I am sure the prayer touched the heart of Christ. He said:

"Saviour, be kind to me and bear with me. I am an old, ignorant man. I grew up without the Bible and knew nothing of thee in my youth. Though I try now to follow thee, I often lose the way, not because I do not want to go in the right road, but because I do not see clearly. Bless my people and be merciful to us. When we sin, wipe out the sin, because we love thee, and thou didst die for us."

The New Mormon President

The new President of the Mormon Church is Joseph Fielding Smith, a nephew of the founder of the church. He is sixty-three years old. He served the Mormon community as a missionary in various lands, and was for some time President of the European mission.

whom we have come to labor. The Wakamba occupy the territory known as Ukamba. It extends from the Tsaro River to Kikuyu. The population is estimated between four and five hundred thousand. The men (a great many of them) are almost naked, with the exception of the brass wire which is freely worn around their necks, arms, waists, and legs. They also make very fine chains out of small brass wire, and great bunches of this is worn in the ears. They are generally well-built fellows, tall, thin, but muscular. As a rule, they have straight-cut features, high in the forehead, and rather intelligent in appearance. The costume of the women is rather picturesque. In front, they wear a small apron of cloth or goatskin, about five inches deep, by seven in breadth. Behind they wear a long V-shaped piece of hide, which reaches to the knees; they also wear an oval hide fastened over the shoulders, which reaches to the hips. The women do not wear so much brass wire, but the quantity of beads some of them carry around their waist and neck is really wonderful. They are an agricultural people, and also possess large herds of cattle and goats. Their weapons of defense are chiefly the bow and arrow and a long sword. Their houses are small conical grass huts, with a door so small, that it is with difficulty you can crawl in when down on "all fours."

Prayer for a Revival

AT this season of the year, when our churches of all denominations are making their plans for the winter's work, would it not be possible to have a combined effort to obtain a genuine old-fashioned revival? Such a movement must be the work of the Holy Spirit. It can never be manufactured, or produced by artificial means; but it might be expected in answer to earnest, united prayer. God's arm has not lost its power. He is as willing as ever to bless his people, and his ancient challenge still remains in force: "Prove me now, here-with, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it." It may be, as James suggests, that we have not because we ask not. Here and there, in isolated communities, there has been a hopeful movement in which many souls have been brought into the kingdom; but the national harvest, of which the church is in need, is delayed. What is the reason? Can it be that this greatest of all blessings, which would gladden the hearts of all Christians, is withheld until all Christians unite in imploring it? The time for such a united effort is singularly appropriate. Never before have the denominations drawn so near to one another. There is a recognition of comradeship on all hands that is being felt everywhere. One difficulty that has hitherto hindered such a movement is therefore removed. It is possible now in every city, town or village of our broad land to bring together Christians of every name in a movement of common interest. If it were possible to get a general agreement throughout the country that during a whole week united meetings should be held simultaneously in every community, to entreat an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, who can tell what the result might be?

How to Stop It

MUST the war between Capital and Labor go on forever? We think not. The Gospel theory of the golden rule will after awhile come in. It will put one hand on the broadcloth shoulder of Capital, and put the other hand on the homespun-covered shoulder of Toil, and say, with a voice that will grandly and gloriously settle this, and settle everything, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." That is, the lady of the household will say, "I must treat the maid in the kitchen just as I would like to be treated if I were down-stairs." The maid in the kitchen must say, "I will have the same industry and fidelity down-stairs as I would expect from my subordinates, if I happened to be the wife of a silk importer."

The owner of an iron mill, having taken a dose of this principle before leaving home in the morning, will go into his foundry, and, passing into what is called the puddling-room, he will see a man there stripped to the waist, and besweated and exhausted with the labor and the toil, and he will say to him, "Why, it seems to be very hot in here. You look very much exhausted. I hear your child is sick with scarlet fever. If you want your wages a little earlier this week, so as to pay the nurse and get the medicines, just come into my office any time."

After awhile, crash goes the money market, and there is no more demand for the articles manufactured in that iron mill, and the owner does not know what to do. He says, "Shall I stop the mill, or shall I run it on half time, or shall I cut down the men's wages?" He walks the floor of his counting-room all day, hardly knowing what to do. Toward evening he calls all the laborers together, and then the manufacturer says to them: "Men, times are very hard; I don't make twenty dollars where I used to make one hundred. Somehow, there is no demand now for what we manufacture, or but very little demand. You see I am at vast expense, and I have called you together this afternoon to see what you would advise. I don't want to shut up the mill, because that would force you out of work, and you have always been very faithful, and I like you, and you seem to like me. I don't know what to do."

There is a dead halt for a minute or two, and then one of the workmen steps out from the ranks of his fellows, and says: "Boss, you have been very good to us, and when you prospered we prospered, and now you are in a tight place and I am sorry, and we have got to sympathize with you. I don't know how the others feel, but I propose that we take off twenty per cent. from our wages, and that when the times get good you will remember us and raise them again." The workman looks around to his comrades, and says: "Boys, what do you say to this? all in favor of my proposition will say ay." "Ay! ay! ay!" shout the voices.

But the mill-owner, getting in some new machinery, exposes himself very much, and takes cold, and it settles into pneumonia, and he dies. In the procession to the tomb are all the workmen, tears rolling down their cheeks, and off upon the ground; but an hour before the procession gets to the cemetery, the wives and the children of those workmen are at the grave waiting for the arrival of the funeral pageant. The minister of religion may have delivered an eloquent eulogium before they started from the house, but the most impressive things are said that day by the working-classes standing around the tomb.

That night in all the cabins of the working-people where they have family prayers, the widowhood and the orphanage in the mansion are remembered. No glaring populace looks over the iron fence of the cemetery; but, hovering over the scene, the benediction of God and man is coming for the fulfilment of the Christlike injunction: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

"Oh," says some man here, "that is all Utopian, that is apocryphal, that is impossible." No. I cut out of a paper this: "One of the pleasantest incidents recorded in a long time is reported from Sheffield, England. The wages of the men in the iron works at Sheffield are regulated by a board of arbitration, by whose decision both masters and men are bound. For some time past the iron and steel trade has been extremely unprofitable, and the employers cannot, without much loss, pay the wages fixed by the board, which neither employers nor employed have the power to change. To avoid this difficulty, the workmen in one of the largest steel works in Sheffield hit upon a device as rare as it was generous. They offered to work for their employers one week without any pay whatever. How much better that plan is than a strike would be."

But you go with me, and I will show you—not so far off as Sheffield, England—factories, banking-houses, storehouses, and other costly enterprises where this same Christlike injunction is fully kept, and you could no more get the employer to practice an injustice upon his men, or the men to conspire against the employer, than you could get your right hand and your left hand, your right eye and your left eye, your right ear and your left ear, into physiological antagonism. Now, where is this to begin? In our homes, in our stores, on our farms—not waiting for other people to do their duty. Is there a divergence now between the parlor and the kitchen? Then there is something wrong, either in the parlor or the kitchen, perhaps in both. Are the clerks in your store irate against the firm? Then there is something wrong, either behind the counter, or in the private office, or perhaps in both.

The great want of the world to-day is the fulfilment of the Christ-like injunction, that which he promulgated in his sermon Olivetic. All the political economists under the heavens in convention for a thousand years cannot settle this controversy between monopoly and hard work, between capital and labor. During the Revolutionary War there was a heavy piece of timber to be lifted, perhaps for some fortress, and a corporal was overseeing the work, and he was giving commands to some soldiers as they lifted: "Heave away, there! yo heave!" Well, the timber was too heavy; they could not get it up. There was a gentleman riding by on a horse, and he stopped and said to this corporal, "Why don't you help them lift? That timber is too heavy for them to lift." "No," he said, "I won't; I am a corporal." The gentleman got off his horse and came up to the place. "Now," he said to the soldiers, "all together—yo heave!" and the timber went to its place. "Now," said the gentleman to the corporal, "when you have a piece of timber too heavy for the men to lift, and you want help, you send to your commander-in-chief." It was Washington. Now, that is the Gospel of giving somebody a lift, a lift out of darkness, a lift out of earth into heaven, the Gospel of helping somebody else to lift.

"Train Up a Child"

PARENTS and teachers have an important addition in the confession made by the miserable creature whose crime has just been expiated. He said that the suggestion to assassination came to him in a speech by Emma Goldman, and that he brooded upon it until the impulse to kill the President became irresistible. Is not this the clue to many other crimes? The victims of evil impulse often do become mere automata. They are driven by a power that controls them to the commission of horrible deeds, which even their own reason condemns. Many drunkards have acknowledged that when the longing for liquor comes upon them, there is no penalty, no power that can keep them from indulging it. This condition is largely the result of defective training. The disposition frequently shows itself in childhood. A boy seeing something he wants, or craving some indulgence, will dwell upon it until he is ready to sacrifice any possession or bring any punishment to gratify his desire. If he acquires the habit of yielding, he is liable to become a lifelong slave to his impulses. He might be saved from such horrible servitude by kindly and judicious discipline. If he were taught in early life how to control his desires, if he were warned of the evil of brooding on some coveted indulgence; if, in short, he were helped to acquire the habit of self-control, he might be saved from crime and misery. Our conception of education as a mere process of cramming the mind with knowledge is largely at fault. Until we realize that moral training is necessary to the development of the child, we must be prepared to be shocked by the crimes of people who plead that they are the creatures of irresistible impulses.

A BEAUTIFUL ART GIFT FOR YOU

AS this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press there is every indication that the demand for the Great Art Portfolio—which has been prepared with infinite labor and expense, with the view of presenting a copy to each and every subscriber—will far exceed anything we could have anticipated. Already the fame of this superb collection of Twelve Masterpieces of American and European Art seems to have spread everywhere, and it is quite evident that our facilities, extensive as they are, will be taxed to their fullest capacity to supply even the initial demand.

Every one of our subscribers is entitled to a Full Set of these magnificent works of art, mailed free immediately upon receipt of subscription, premium and non-premium subscribers sharing equally the pleasure of the gift. No Art Collection has ever been presented in this country under similar conditions. It is a veritable Gallery of Modern Masters, selected with the utmost care, by a highly critical jury and admirably presented, on sheets "egg-shelled" or "rouged," in the style that delights the connoisseurs, and twelve placed in a beautiful cover and securely packed for absolutely safe delivery. These pictures embrace a range of art themes sufficiently wide to meet every desire, and each separate picture is a gem worthy of permanent preservation, and suitable for framing as an adornment of parlor or boudoir.

We have one of these Fine Art Portfolios for you, for the delight of your household and the decoration of your home, but you would do wisely to send for it at once. This is disinterested advice on our part. It is now tolerably certain that, even working with all facilities at high pressure, our art engravers will hardly be able to produce more of these beautiful Portfolios than were originally promised us for delivery by a certain date, and we fear that some few of our friends, who are unintentionally dilatory in sending in their subscriptions, may feel disappointed at having to wait. Our earnest hope is that they may not tarry too long.

By prompt action now, all delays and disappointments will be avoided, and every subscriber can receive this exquisite Art Collection in good time and excellent shape. It is by far the finest and most valuable Holiday Surprise we have ever prepared for our widespread CHRISTIAN HERALD family of readers, and we are particularly anxious that every one may receive it in ample time, before the mails are congested with the usual avalanche of holiday business, at the Christmas season.

Help us to carry out this programme by sending in your subscription to-day. And when you have received and thoroughly examined your Art Portfolio, drop us a postcard saying how you like it, and which of its dozen gems of art is your especial favorite.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Turkish Port Menaced

ONCE more the irrepressible Eastern question is disturbing the Cabinets of Europe. Turkey has aroused the indignation of the French Government and there appears to be danger of open hostilities. The matter in dispute is a question of money. Some time ago certain French contractors undertook the construction of some quays in Constantinople, on the understanding that when completed the Sultan would purchase them, raising a loan of eight million dollars for the purpose. When the time for the purchase came, the Sultan delayed action and would neither buy the quays himself, nor permit the contractors to sell them to anyone else. The contractors appealed to their government and diplomatic pressure was brought to bear on the Sultan. He, however, still delayed settlement on various pretexts. Finally, diplomatic relations were severed. The French ambassador at Constantinople was withdrawn and the Turkish ambassador at Paris was notified that his further official stay in the French Capital was not desirable. It was expected that so marked a step, which, with any other power would have been regarded as a preliminary of war, would have brought the Sultan to terms, but he still continued to delay. The French Government, losing all patience, despatched a fleet of warships to the eastern Mediterranean. Their precise destination was kept secret, but rumors are circulated that Smyrna is the port they are bound for, and, it is surmised, that the French intend to take possession of the Turkish Custom House there and hold it until they have collected sufficient dues to pay the sum owing to the company which constructed the quays, and to pay also another sum of two and a-half millions, said to be due from Turkey as indemnities to Frenchmen in other causes. The Sultan, on hearing of the expedition, manifested no disposition to yield, but, on the contrary, took measures to prevent the French seizing Smyrna by placing submarine mines in the harbor and strengthening the fortifications. Later, however, he made promises of payment, which may avert hostilities. This is not the first time by many that Smyrna has been menaced by a hostile fleet. It is an ancient city, the history of which goes back nearly three thousand years. It was captured in 1402 by Timur, but it soon passed into Mohammedan hands, and has remained so to this day. It is of interest to the Bible student from the fact that one of the seven churches mentioned in Revelation was located there. The message to that church was one that in its present circumstances, the city would be glad to apply to itself, for it must suffer severely if there should be a struggle between France and Turkey for its possession, but its people have now no claim on the encouragement given to the ancient church, to which Christ said:

Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer (Rev. 2:10).

Saved by the Chaplain

There was a dangerous fire in New York last week. It was in the premises occupied by a rubber and belting manufacturer. A watchman discovered it late at night and turned in an alarm. The firemen found that a gas pipe in the cellar was leaking, and in some way the gas had become ignited and had set fire to the stock of rubber. Being in the sub-cellar, it was difficult to reach. The smoke was exceedingly dense, and the stench almost insupportable. The firemen worked hard, but one after another they were overcome and were carried out into the fresh air to recover. They returned as soon as they regained consciousness, but were able to stay among the fumes only a few minutes at a time. When the flames were almost under control, some question arose that had to be submitted to the Battalion Chief. He could not be found, though it was known that he had come to the fire. The firemen were too exhausted to make a thorough search, and the fire was requiring all their attention. Just then, the Chaplain of the Department, William St. Elmo Smith, arrived, and was told of the mystery of the Chief. He at once plunged into the smoke and searched for the missing man. He was found completely unconscious on the floor. Unaided, the Chaplain dragged him to the ladder, up which he was carried. The Chaplain worked over him until an ambulance arrived, and undoubtedly saved his life. The chaplain gave a practical illustration of the spirit of his calling. In his spiritual work he has doubtless found it necessary to seek those who are in danger as well as to preach to those who will come to hear him.

Go out into the highways and hedges, and constrain them to come in, that my house may be filled (Luke 14:23).

TYPICAL GROUP ON THE SMYRNA DOCKS

Instead of Lighthouses

An experiment is being made on the St. Lawrence which may bearing on river navigation. It is a scheme devised specially to do away with the lighthouses, buoys, and the entire paraphernalia for night navigation between Montreal and Quebec, and substitute a submerged electric system which, however, will apply to all inland navigable waters. The main idea is to sink an electric cable in the centre of the navigable channels, with power transmitted from a power house at Montreal, and lines of colored lights at or above the water level each side of the channel, the lights on one side being of a different color to those on the other side, and supported by cork floats. The difference will be that mariners will not be warned of the danger, but will be shown the path of safety. The object to be attained is the same, and in the voyage of life both ways are needed, for men often leave the path of safety and need to be warned of the dangers which may wreck their souls.

THE PORT OF SMYRNA MENACED BY THE FRENCH FLEET

All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness (II. Timothy 3:16).

An Ancient Festival

A ceremony that has been annually observed for thousands of years has just been celebrated in Cairo, Egypt. It is called "Cutting the Khaliz." It takes place when the Nile reaches the highest point in its annual overflow. A steamer is gaily decked, and amid the plaudits of thousands of spectators rides down the river, as a proof of the inundation having taken place and the prospects of a harvest being good. The ceremony has been shorn of some barbarous features. It was formerly the custom to find the most beautiful girl in Egypt, and, having dressed her in gorgeous robes, cast her into the river as the bride of the Nile. Her companions, and even her own family, took part in this ghastly sacrifice, and the selection of the girl, even though, as generally happened, she belonged to an aristocratic family, was esteemed an honor. The Khaliz, to which the title of the ceremony refers, was a canal which formerly ran through Cairo and was filled only at the Nile inundation. Its bank was cut to show that the river had risen to the height needed by the agriculturists for the annual sowing. The English have filled up the canal because its filth was a menace to the health of the city. The ancient ceremony is therefore now without its two most conspicuous features, for the people are now prevented sacrificing the virgin and they have no canal to cut. They do well to be grateful, for if the Nile failed to rise in its season, famine would follow. But it is well that they no longer offer their dreadful sacrifices in their celebration. Better still would it be, if they knew why all such sacrifices are forever unnecessary.

Who needeth not daily, as those High Priests, to offer sacrifice for this he did once, when he offered up himself (Heb. 7:27).

A Child in Peril

A deed of daring was performed by an employee of the Ontario & Western Railroad on October 30, which resulted in saving the life of a child. The early morning train was nearing Goshen, N. Y., and had just turned a curve when the engineer saw a little girl toddling along the track ahead of the train. He uttered a cry of consternation, and shut off the steam and applied the emergency brake. It was evident, however, that the speed of the train would not be checked before it overtook the child. The engineer turned in an agony of distress to tell the fireman of the tragedy impending, but the fireman was not in his accustomed place. He, too, had seen the little girl, and being himself a father was shocked by her danger. He had crawled out of the cab, and, though the train was running at terrific speed, had made his way along the running board. The engineer saw the man leap from the board to the pilot, and held his breath in fear of his slipping off. But the fireman was sure-footed. He kept his balance and, reaching out an arm a foot or two beyond, snatched up the child before the pilot struck her, and lifted her safely to the pilot. In a few minutes the train came to a standstill, and the heroic fireman, with the rescued child in his arms, returned to the cab. How thankful the child's parents must be to the brave man who took such an awful risk to save her life. She is too young to appreciate the service he rendered her, but when she grows older she will hear of it and understand. We may hope that she will hear too of One who, to save her from a fate even worse than that she escaped, laid down his life, and that she will consecrate her life to Him.

Christ died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them (II. Cor. 5:15).

BRIEF NOTES

The Rev. Arthur Sowerby, of the Baptist Missionary Society, the only missionary who escaped the massacre in Shansi, North China, is returning to his station there, and will be accompanied by the Rev. Joshua Turner.

The two famous gold cities of Ballarat and Bendigo in Australia, have, for the first time in their history, Temperance Mayors. They have both issued notices that at the municipal entertainments no intoxicating liquor must be provided.

Through the efforts of two native Christians who came into the district from Tinnevely, seventeen Shanar villages in South India have asked for Christian teachers, and the whole community, numbering 60,000, seems likely to be affected.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's labors at Dallas, Tex., have been blessed of God to a large ingathering of souls. Two important meetings were held on October 27. At the first, which was for young men only, about 2,500 were present. Of these three hundred asked for prayer, more than one-half of whom have since made public profession of Christ. At the general meeting, in the evening, it was necessary to use two churches for the overflow, and they were crowded to the doors. The scene was one that will not soon be forgotten in the city.

GEMS FROM THE WORLD'S GREAT PULPITS

Living Thoughts from the Recent Sermons of Eminent Preachers of Many Denominations

MORAL ESTIMATES

DR. CHARLES H. PARKHURST, MADISON SQUARE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, NEW YORK

THE enmity toward God that we have to get rid of, the indifference or even antagonism to his holy will that we need to be delivered from, is not in what we do, but in what makes us do it. We judge men by what they do, for if we are going to judge them at all that is the only ground we have to go upon. It is bad enough that the doctors can look straight into our bodies, and it would be intolerably embarrassing if any scheme of moral perforation should ever be able to turn a man's heart and conscience inside out, going right through clothes, flesh, bones, clear to a man's ethical marrow. And the embarrassment we should experience under those circumstances means that what our acts tell our neighbors about ourselves is only very distantly related to what our hearts tell us about ourselves. Now it is only when you get to that spot in a man where he does his desiring that you reach the real ground of what a man is. A man is morally to be measured not by what he says or does, or even thinks, but by what he wants, by his likings. And for a man who behaves very well, but who would not behave nearly as well if it were not that something or other makes him afraid to behave badly, for such an one to claim that because he behaves well he is therefore a good man is a piece of transparent evasion; he is lying to himself, and he knows he is lying to himself.

DIVINE COMPANIONSHIP

DR. H. P. DEWEY, CHURCH OF THE PILGRIMS, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

EVERY pure highly ordered life is a kind of judgment seat before which other lives are made to stand, and its verdict of condemnation or approval they are certain to feel. Every elevated life exerts, also, the judgment of encouragement. Instinctively we turn to those more distinguished in their rectitude, and feel that in them we have the sanction and the guarantee of our own poorer virtue. They seem to invite us up to their level and to declare our inborn relationship with what is highest and best, and we fain would come up to their standard, meet the judgment of their better doing and be approved. Still higher do we look to him who is the perfect ideal and long to be worthy to stand before him because we have attained unto something of the measure of the fullness of his stature. Yea, more; we would not only have the judgment of approval before him: we would also have the judgment which permits us to be in company with him. And so, in and through every other ambition, is the desire to be worthy, to stand at last before the Son of Man and hear him say, not only 'Well done,' but also 'Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord,' into the eternal fellowship of kindred spirits united in the bonds of worthiness.

CHRIST'S CULMINATING POWER

DR. CAMDEN M. COBERN, DENVER, COLO.

ONE of Christ's most astonishing claims was this: That he was able as a divine Saviour to pardon sin, answer prayer, and give comfort to the believer anywhere, world without end. To-day millions believe that he is doing now all over this world just what he claimed he would do. He claimed that although he should die, his religion would not die; but that a church with himself as its centre should, though beginning as a mustard-seed, grow until it should revolutionize all civilization. He taught three years, predicted his martyrdom, and died; died while yet a youth, and yet his presence is felt to-day in every government and in almost every home on the civilized globe. He never stepped out of Palestine, but now walks with power to the ends of the earth, and is acknowledged as King by ten thousand times ten thousand subjects. He has, as Jean Paul says, "Lifted with his pierced hands empires off their hinges, and has turned the stream of centuries out of its channel, and still governs armies." Who to-day does not acknowledge that this religion is just fitted to the needs of this world? What is the power of this Christian religion now working in the world and in human hearts? It is he: fitted for the world as if the world were made for him; fitted for the heart as if the heart were made for him. It is he, the divine Christ, "the Son of the Living God."

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY

DR. J. F. DICKIE, IN THE AMERICAN CHURCH IN BERLIN, GERMANY*

WE are struck with consternation and horror at the dire calamity that has come to the whole nation in the loss of the President. Has death triumphed then? Are these trappings and suits of woe the tokens of his dark victory? O death, thou carriest away in thy devouring rage the learned and the ignorant, the old and the young, the slave and the oppressor, the peasant and the king, the pauper and the President. Yet how brief and deceptive is thy seeming triumph! Thou art compelled to cry out, "O Galilean, thou hast conquered!" Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Hallelujah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. From eternity to eternity God is love.

We express our feelings of sympathy with the nation be-

*At the memorial service, when Dr. Dickie preached, the Emperor was represented by the Lord Chamberlain, Count zu Solms-Baruth; the Master of Ceremonies, Count von Kanitz, and Baron von Lincanus, Chief of the Civil Cabinet. The Secretary of Foreign Affairs was present in person. The service was attended also by the Ambassadors of Great Britain, Spain, and Turkey. A large number of American and English persons then visiting Berlin thronged the auditorium.

reft of its President. In every home from the Atlantic to the Pacific there is deep regret. From the eyes even of strong men the teardrops of sorrow fall. The whole land mourneth: Thou, O Lord God has smitten us full sore. Thy right hand hath been heavy upon us. Thou hast suffered the hate of the assassin to see its desire upon the President. Thou hast taken away the father of his people. Yet O Lord we are silent because thou hast permitted it to come upon us. The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord.

TRANSFORMATION BY THE CROSS

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, BALTIMORE, MD.

THANK God, the force of the Cross remains. The forces of evil may still be cast out by the return in individual life and social ideal and national character to the recognition of the supremacy of the spiritual as expressed in the pathway to light through the death on the Cross. Let the man who hears my voice to-day but consent to bury selfish interests in identification with Christ, and he will find the power of the Cross sufficient to cast out every form of evil that has hitherto mastered him. Let society but consent to reconstruct itself upon the principles of the Cross, denying selfish ambitions, refusing to labor for selfish ends, and each to serve the rest, and society will be renewed, regenerated, by the power of the Cross. Let but the nations learn that greatness consists, not in mastership of the weak by the strong, but in the service of one to all and the intercourse in love of the tribes and families of the earth, and the Cross shall be found to have healed the wounds of the nations by proclaiming, first the evangel of a great service, and by them communicating the dynamic of a new life. And there is no other healing for humanity but by way of the Cross. I thank God the attraction of the Cross lives. What is it, the attraction of the Cross? The Cross? No, the Cross will not attract you, my brother. What will attract? The Christ. Said he: "I, if I be lifted up, will draw." It is here we have made our mistake: we have too long been trying to be attracted by the Cross, and we never can be. But let the vision of the Crucified once break upon our souls and we shall forget the Cross in our eagerness to get to the Christ. We must come, then, by way of the Cross, and any Christ uplifted other than by the way of his Cross is a false Christ. I must come by that way to see him, but coming there I am to see him. It is the King of Love that attracts men, and when we see him as King of Love we begin to understand his Cross, and are thereby healed.

THE SPIRITUAL BODY

REV. JOSEPH HAMILTON, MIMICO, CANADA

THE nature and functions of the spiritual body cannot be adequately understood until the spiritual body is actually put on, just as a caterpillar cannot understand the butterfly life until it becomes a butterfly. Yet I believe there is one theory in regard to the spiritual body that is sustained both by reason and revelation; and I believe this theory will go far to explain our Lord's fleshly appearances during the forty days, though at that time the mortal had put on immortality.

The theory, then, which I would advance is this: That the spiritual body is endowed with the capacity of transforming itself at pleasure into the natural body, and back again into the spiritual. We say the spiritual body, for we mean that this power of transformation belongs to spiritual bodies generally, and not to that of Christ alone. Thus we avoid the invocation of a miracle, rightly considered. To be sure, such a transformation would be a real miracle to us in this lower realm of being; but it might, perhaps, be no miracle, but a natural law, in a higher realm. It seems to me that electricity not only gives an illustration of quick and radical bodily transition, but it gives us a hint of the material of which the spiritual body may be composed. Electricity itself, so swift in its motion, and so powerful and glorious in its effects may possibly be the very substance of the spiritual body. It is more likely, however, that a more ethereal substance, still, as yet entirely unknown to us, may be the material. Even electricity would seem to be too cumbersome to meet the necessities of the case, but it certainly does give us a hint of glorious possibilities.

HOW THE KINGDOM WILL COME

DR. SAMUEL J. NICOLLS, PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, ST. LOUIS MO

THE masses of the people need help; but no laws, no combinations of men for self help, no theories of social reform can by themselves secure it. The sovereign remedy is that declared by our Lord: "If the truth shall make you free ye shall be free indeed." If the kingdom of God is ever set up on earth it will come through the regeneration of each individual. "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Just laws and their faithful execution wholesome limitations of wealth and power, adequate rewards for labor, shorter hours for toil, and general education all have their places; but, after all, the supreme forces in the purification and elevation of society are moral and spiritual. Without these all the rest are mocking delusions. But, alas, what multitudes in our midst utterly ignore this fact, and live under the dominion of their sense. They are a law unto themselves, and so live without God and without hope in the world.

HOW TO BECOME BEAUTIFUL

DR. N. D. HILLIS, PLYMOUTH CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

THE real sculptors of the face are not from without; they are hands spiritual working from within. Every thought is an artist. Every purpose cuts like a chisel. Every prayer lends dignity to the brow. Every impure desire leaves a mark of degradation. In a bad man one can see mud in the bottom of the eyes. It was this that Ruskin had in mind when he spoke of "the operation of the intellectual powers upon the features, in the fine cutting and chiseling of them in the removal from them of signs of sensuality and sloth, by which they are blunted and deadened; in the substitution of energy and intensity for vacancy and insipidity; in the keenness given to the eye and the fine molding to the brow in the open and reflective comprehensiveness of the eye and the forehead; in the waxing of the intellect that wears down the flesh, and the moral enthusiasm burning its way out to heaven, through the emancipation of the earthly vessel until the face takes on an ideal glory, a purer and higher range than that of the mere material form." The fact none can deny. It is this, doubtless, that explains the strange facial resemblances between some husbands and wives in old age. They began fifty years before, unlike in face and feature. Perhaps the one was blonde and the other brunette. But after long living in the same home, loving the same books, thrilling with the same ambitions, cherishing the same solemn purposes, they stand forth stamped with facial resemblance without, as they have long been brother and sister within. And all these considerations of face building remind us anew of the apostle's words, "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are of good report, think on these things."

THE EVERLASTING GUIDE

DR. W. T. DAVISON, WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, BLACKHEATH, ENGLAND

WHEN the Psalmist said, The Lord will be our God, he meant to the end and beyond the end.

And though from out this bourne of time and space

The tide may bear me far,

I hope to see my Pilot face to face,

When I have crossed the bar.

Whatever bar it is, whatever bit of sand, on which the waves break, whatever sea there is beyond the next life, or the life beyond that, and any number of lives, he will be our Guide to follow. There is something very pathetic when we think of the helplessness of men as regards the pilgrimage of life. What children we are, we strong men who are able to do so many things in life and to do them well. Stanley tells us that when he and his party were about to cross the Dark Continent for the first time, starting from Lake Tanganyika, a good many of those strong men burst into tears, not through cowardice or weakness, but simply because their emotion must find vent. Ah! but they had before them what arid deserts, what impenetrable forests, what savage beasts, what men worse than beasts in crossing that continent so unknown. Yet that journey was nothing to that which you and I have to take. But if we will only take God as Guide for ourselves, a Guide for our loved ones, a Guide for the Church, we have in him an eternal unfailing helper; as able as he is willing; wiser than the wisest, stronger than the strongest, and more tender than the kindest heart.

THE GREATEST OF FLOWER SHOWS

IN MADISON SQUARE GARDEN, NEW YORK

GROUP OF PALMS AND FOLIAGE

CROSS the big pond which separates us from our English cousins, there is a practical interest in everything connected with gardening and farming, which is in strong contrast with anything we have known recently over here. From Queen Alexandra down, the women of the aristocracy, Lady Te, Countess Edith, Duchess Tall-ers, Baroness Fairview, whatever stately names and titles may be, only patronize, but actively prosecute industries which have their origin in the cultivation of Nature, and many young girls of good family and education, take courses in bee-keeping, horticulture, fruit and flower-raising and the like, and find in the avocation a chance for self-support.

We have had Flower-Shows in New York before this autumn, but never any thing on a scale so grand, or carried out so beautifully in every detail, as in the present year. The immense floor-space of Madison Square Garden, the stairs and balconies, everything which makes the Garden a place of popular resort for shows of every description, were used to form a magnificent background for foliage and bloom. Aisles lined with stately palms, tropic evergreens, the variety and charm of a great forest in miniature, met the eye as one entered the garden. There was, of course, a rose day, a violet day, an orchid day, and a chrysanthemum day, and prizes were awarded to those who sent the finest specimens and arranged the most striking displays. Park gardens and private green-houses were among the contributors. Many ladies and gentlemen of wealth, as well as professional florists, are doing what they can to invent and develop new combinations for example, chrysanthemum culture, and as one surveys the results, one is almost bewildered, so fascinating and so extraordinary are the flowers which have responded to the crossing of types, to fertilization, and to the constant and loving care of the gardener.

The geraniums made a brave show; they are always bold, fearless flowers, which know how to show their finest goods, so to speak, in the shop-window. For sheer effectiveness in making a brilliant use of color, geraniums are unsurpassed, indoors or out. Their long, broad leaves of the great begonia clan were in evidence. The orchids, those flowers of mystery and dream, exotics from the torrid zone, but responsive to the kindly care of flower-lovers in a colder clime, were the most charming features of the scene. Fruits and vegetables, Pomona's gifts, were in generous profusion, and prizes were awarded to various exhibitors for best success in growing apples, pears, peaches and

The flowers of the fall

Up the sky, the white clouds rally,
The winds come sweeping through the valley,
We hear the tempest's bugle-call; [valley,
We prize the flowers of the Fall.

Not now, the fragile petals flushing,
With tender pink and faintly blushing,
Are Spring's sweet buds, that charm the day
When April dances into May.

But, strong to challenge rude disaster,
The sumac and the fearless aster,
The gentian and the cardinal,
Bring up the legions of the Fall.

On highway and on slope and meadow,
So bright its radiance casts a shadow,
Wherever foot of man hath trod,
Behold the sturdy goldenrod.

And, careless of the frost's chill nipping,
With cups of sweet for honeyed sipping,
The serried legions marching come,
Autumn's chief guard—chrysanthemum.

Ere long by mountain, field and river,
Bare boughs will lean, stark branches shiver;
To-day, the world with banners fair,
Receives the Winter's bleaker air.

And Autumn, if she must be dying,
Breathes out her life, with colors flying;
In pomp and beauty to the last,
She reigns, and then—the Fall is past.

for grapes grown under glass and for tomatoes, the real winners being the gardeners, Swedish, Scotch, or Dutch.

The vegetables appealed to the utilitarian, rather than the ornamental view-point and so there was much longer lingering on the part of visitors, beside the spicy-sweet and radiantly variegated pinks and carnations, the roses of almost countless shades of difference, and the splendid chrysanthemums. There is a new rose, called "Mrs. Oliver Ames." It is cherry-red, and hails from Boston. But it cannot expect to be the prime favorite that the American Beauty is.

The Flower Show, in the eyes of any thoughtful observer, was attractive not only in itself, but in the crowds that it drew day by day. One noticed a great many tall and graceful young women, with the air that stamps New York girls as very strong and vigorous. Children, accompanied by an elder sister or governess, fathers and mothers wandering here and there among the flowers, and interchanging happy glances; critical visitors, learned in the sciences of seeds and bulbs, and soils and temperatures, a great friendly, cheery succession of people of all ages and types were drawn together by the Flower Show. The groups chatted eagerly, laughter and jests rippled out. Inevitably the blue-coated policeman stood or sauntered about, but one could only hope that his services were required merely for direction and guidance. Somehow pick-pockets and flowers are oddly contradictory, yet, as we know by occasional mournful experience, and by the revelations of Josiah Flynt, the prowler in society seizes for a field day, just such opportunities as a flower or any other show affords.

New York, in October, overflows with guests from other sections of the country. The country cousins who have entertained city people all summer, now come to town for their own outing. Western and Southern merchants are here to buy goods, and their pretty wives and daughters are with them to enjoy the metropolis. There is always enough to please stranger-folk from the Battery to the Bronx, from the Bridge to Central Park, and they may be known by their pleased and eager looks, their manner of leisure, as opposed to the New Yorker's habitual rush, and by some curiously subtle phases of accent.

The Westerner is distinct, a trifle abrupt, and has r's to spare. The Southerner has vowel sounds in predominance, and speaks with soft-voiced gentleness. One and all they are welcome within our gates.

"Therefore My People Are Gone Into Captivity"

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE LESSON

 INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
 FOR NOVEMBER 24. ISAIAH 5: 8-30

 BY DR. AND MRS.
 WILBUR F. CRAFTS

 GOLDEN TEXT: WOE UNTO THEM THAT ARE MIGHTY TO DRINK WINE. ISAIAH 5: 22

THE lessons take but a step aside in turning from the bondage in Egypt to the worse bondage of drink. Israel was not to blame for its enslavement under Rameses; but for the captivity to Rum, which led to the captivity in Assyria, they were themselves responsible. The Bible names as two of the causes of the captivity, Sabbath-breaking and intemperance (Neh. 13: 18; Isa. 28: 1; 5: 13). In Isaiah's time "the drunkards of Ephraim," that is, the ten tribes, had just gone into captivity, and he foresaw that like intemperance in Judah would so surely produce the same result, that he spoke of its captivity of a hundred years later as already accomplished: "Therefore my people are gone into captivity." Judah's captivity to drink was a present fact, and that was worst of all. Sin should be more dreaded than its punishment. Byron exclaims for every sin-bound captive: "Myself am hell."

The Lesson Story

The long period between the Egyptian bondage and the Assyrian captivity, Isaiah epitomizes in the opening verses of our lesson chapter by the allegory of the vineyard, used all through the Bible as a picture of God's relations to his people (Psa. 80: 8-19; Isa. 5: 1-7; Jer. 2: 21; Hos. 10: 1; Matt. 21: 33-39; John 15).

The vine is transplanted by God's mighty and loving hand from Egypt to the Land of Promise. There he does everything possible to make it fruitful. He digs about it, gathers out the stones, and builds a hedge and watch-tower to protect it. He exclaims: "What more could I have done for my vineyard that I have not done in it?" He looks for rich clusters of sweet grapes; but it bears only wild grapes, deadly nightshade, and apples of Sodom, pleasant to the sight, but ashes and poison to the taste. He goes far away, and gives his husbandmen another trial. At the time for fruit, he sends his servants for the harvest, and they are stoned away. After that there is nothing left but judgment. The unfaithful husbandmen are punished, and the unfruitful vineyard left to desolation.

The meaning of the vineyard allegories that we have combined is clear. God gave the Jews a land flowing with milk and honey. He hedged them against surrounding idolaters by mountains and deserts. He placed them at the junction of Europe, Asia and Africa, where they might give the glad fruits of righteousness to the world. He gave them the law from Sinai, and wondrous teachings by the prophets. And yet, instead of yielding the fruit of the Spirit, love, joy, peace, they yielded the wild grapes described in the lesson, covetousness and intemperance.

The founders of the United States often noted what their sons should not forget, that America is the modern Land of Promise. God sifted three continents for the seed with which he planted this nation. And he cries to us: "What more could I have done for my vineyard that I have not done in it in planting it in a new land, hedged with oceans against monarchy and church and state traditions? Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth the wild grapes of greed and appetite and lust, all increasing at this hour?"

Illustration and Application

Woe unto them that rise up early that they may follow strong drink. Let us recall what was so fully proved in the September

Wine and Woe temperance lesson, that the "mockery," wine, promises to give back for the money spent on it, strength and health and joy, but really gives the opposite in all three cases—weakness, disease and woe. Over and over again, the Bible links "wine," and "woe" (Prov. 23: 29; Isa. 5: 11, 22; 28: 1; Hab. 2: 15). And every day they are linked in life, and the links are those of a galling chain. It drags its victim out of bed early for his "eye-opener," and keeps him up late for his "nightcap." As he takes the same thing to warm him in winter and cool him in summer, so he takes to arouse his powers in the morning the very thing he will take to put himself to sleep at night. So easily does the "mockery" deceive his ready slave!

A relative of the writer, who was boarding at a hotel, was helped out of a sleepless spell one night by a glass of brandy. He repeated that sleeping draught at nine o'clock for several weeks until one evening he discovered that he was wishing for nine o'clock to come. He heeded this warning clank of his chain, and broke it in time. Say to some drinking friend: "You think you do not care for your glass; that you can stop as easy as not. Stop for a week, and see how it seems." One man, who laughingly accepted such a challenge, said to the challenger at the end of the week, "I thank you for warning me in time. I had no idea what a hold the drink had upon me." All of which illustrates the great saying: "Sow an act, and you reap a tendency; sow a tendency, and you reap a habit; sow a habit, and you reap a character; sow a character, and you reap a destiny." Let this warn us against the beginnings of bad habits, and urge us to the beginnings of good ones.

Isaiah's reminder, that the drinking begins "early" and ends "late," ought to suggest further limitation of the saloon hours. Why should the worst business have the longest day? And it has been growing longer of late, until it has come to pass that many saloons never close. The saloon is bad at all hours, but doubly so in leisure hours. Liquor and leisure never meet but for mischief. For that reason many States close saloons on all holidays, and for the same reason they should be closed at the usual hours of business closing every night, that they may not become loafing, treating, plotting resorts. Isaiah's words, "till wine inflame them," reminds how alcohol sets passion on fire, and raises red flags in eyes and nose. Napoleon, the great leader of men, chose them by their noses. He was right. Men's noses often throw great light on their characters, as any barkeeper knows.

The harp and the lute, the tabret and the pipe, and wine are in their feasts. It would curtail the attractions of the saloon if they were forbidden by law to use music.

Music as a Siren

Any musician who will sell himself for a saloon siren should be excluded from all other opportunities to use the gift he has so prostituted, and he should be counted the guilty accomplice of the rum-seller in his promotion of vice and crime. There is an amazing lack of conscience among many musicians. They play or sing whenever and wherever the fee is forthcoming, as if they had no more responsibility than an orchestration. One night it is a saloon, the next a foul theatre, the third a church gathering or a party in some Christian home. Strange that even Christians forget that the man behind the song is as important as the melody. The writer has seen young men flocking to a saloon on the run when music sent forth its invitation. Whenever sentiment is not ready to suppress tion, strengthen the unspiritual forces in us? Will any question that alcohol quickens passion, the chief foe of the spirit in the battle of the spirit against the flesh? Nearly all churches exclude liquor-sellers from membership, but many of them receive a tippler as a member with not even an admonition. What sense is there in this theory many that the seller is a sinner, while the buyer may be a saint? If it is wrong to sell intoxicants, it is wrong to maintain the business by patronage or petition or vote.

Therefore my people are gone into captivity for lack of knowledge. Though many drink with full knowledge of their sin, saying, defiantly, to those who treat, "Nominate your poison," a far greater number are carried into captivity "for lack of knowledge." If their path from childhood had been sown knee-deep with the best temperance literature, they would not have been charmed and enchained. First of all, the parent and teacher should make every child familiar with the fact that science, translating God's book of nature, declares that alcohol is a poison, whether dressed in wine or whiskey, and so harmful as a beverage, whether taken moderately or immoderately. It is especially important that they should know that the danger in drink is not alone the danger of becoming a drunkard or even drunken, of which no one will ever admit he is in danger, though many greater men have fallen. Here are five scientific translations of God's law in nature, who say those who were never drunk may injure themselves and their children by what they call moderate drinking:

Dr. Benjamin Rush, in his celebrated essay in 1885, said: "Ardent spirits often bring fatal diseases without producing drunkenness. I have known many persons destroyed by them who were never completely intoxicated in the whole course of their lives. The ordinary instances of longevity which are now met with in hard drinkers, no more prove the deadly effects of ardent spirits than the solitary instances of recoveries from a parent death by drowning prove that there is no danger to life from a human body lying an hour or two under water." Dr. Anstie, one of the greatest of the physicians of our day, says: "Many drinkers who were never drunk have yet transmitted very unstable nervous systems to their children." The Lancet, December, 1884, says: "Along with all the teetotalism that exists, there is a appalling amount of tipping that does not distinctly intoxicate, but saturates the principal organs and destroys them more quickly than would an occasional debauch. . . . Dr. William Gull has said that it is one of the commonest things in our society for people to be injured by drink without being drunk. The injury occurs, and goes on so quietly that it is very difficult to observe its access or progress." Sir Henry Thomson, F. R. S., says: "I have no hesitation in attributing a very large proportion of some of the most painful and dangerous maladies which come under my notice, as well as those which every medical man has to treat, to the ordinary daily use of fermented drinks taken in a quantity which is conventionally deemed moderate." Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson of London, has more recently made a similar declaration.

Children and all others having learned that God in nature warns us against alcohol, should next be taught that God in history repeats the same warning in thousands of tragedies. Why did Hinduism, in Old Testament times, forbid wine? Why was it that Buddha, five hundred years before Christ, in his fifth commandment required total abstinence of all his followers? Who was it that Mohammed, also, in founding the second greatest of the uninspired religions, forbade wine? Had not the history of man even then proclaimed that moderate drinking is the straight road to drunkenness, and drunkenness the door to hell? Is there any significance in the fact that every drunkard since history began, has intended to be only a "moderate drinker?" What is a fair logical inference from the fact that the American churches, whose leaders of a century ago were so sincerely believed that the teaching of "moderation" would cure drunkenness, abandoned that method after a half century's trial, and have ever since adhered to total abstinence as the only preventive of drunkenness. Does God, then, add to the prohibition of alcoholic beverages what he has expressed in the laws of Nature, a second giving of the law in the records of Providential History, for instance, the historic fact that even men who could conquer the submission or the admiration of nations have often been conquered by the cup which they sought to use in "moderation?"

Woe unto them that draw up iniquity with cords of falsehood and sin as it were with a cart rope. This probably interprets that feeling that made a drunkard out of a man that when he walked the street, and came in front of a saloon it seemed as if a rope were dragging him in. The "rope" is a serpent that is crushing out his life and that of his children, a modern Laocoon tragedy in real life. Laocoon was punished by Apollo for marrying without that god's permission—perhaps also for warning the Trojans against the wooden horse filled with hostile soldiers, by which Troy was taken. It is not exposing a deadly gift, but by accepting it, that the modern Laocoon comes to his living death.

THE SCULPTURED GROUP OF LAOCOON, EMBLEMATIC OF THE LIQUOR CURSE

the evil traffic altogether, let it be stripped of all its bait and traps, so that only those shall enter a saloon who go there to drink. Few of the young would enter in such case.

It was the custom to store liquors in church cellars in Boston. As late as 1850, and probably later, the cellar of the stone church on Bowdoin Square was used by the Trull Distillery near by for the ripening in hogsheads of New England rum. Some one found a hymn book in a pew and copied into it the following verses:

There are spirits above and spirits below;
 The spirits of love and the spirits of woe,
 The spirits above are the spirits of love;
 The spirits below are the spirits of woe.
 The Spirit above is the Spirit divine;
 The spirits below are the spirits of wine.

They regard not the work of Jehovah. In this declaration Isaiah teaches that spirituous and spiritual things do not harmonize. Half a century ago Bibles and bottles dwelt together in harmony in homes and churches. Even now there are many who profess to be Christians, and to desire above all things to be as spiritual and useful as possible, who use intoxicating beverages daily, and offer them to their guests. Is it not true that intoxicating beverages, even when not used to intoxication, strengthen the unspiritual forces in us? Will any question that alcohol quickens passion, the chief foe of the spirit in the battle of the spirit against the flesh? Nearly all churches exclude liquor-sellers from membership, but many of them receive a tippler as a member with not even an admonition. What sense is there in this theory many that the seller is a sinner, while the buyer may be a saint? If it is wrong to sell intoxicants, it is wrong to maintain the business by patronage or petition or vote.

Can the Bible and the Bottle Dwell Together?

PREACHES IN CHINESE DRESS

THE Rev. E. E. Aiken, a missionary who lost his wife in China, is now in this country with his two children. While engaged in his work in China, he invariably wore the native costume, as it gave him greater opportunities of access to the people he sought to serve. He has appeared before American audiences in the same costume. Mr. Aiken says the Chinese now regard the Western movement as having utterly collapsed. They now entertain a kindlier feeling toward Christians than they have had at any previous time. The passing of the storm of war and massacre is to be followed by a brighter day than has yet dawned upon "the land of Sinim." Speaking of the Chinese people, he says: "It could hardly be expected that a great, ancient and conservative race could change their religious beliefs and customs, and adopt Christianity without struggle. In the recent uprising in North China, we see history repeating itself; yet the power of Christianity in the world is now so great that it does not seem possible for religious persecution to reach the lengths which it reached in former instances. Witness the way in which persecution has already been stopped and the wrongs of many native Christians righted through the interference of Western nations."

Moreover, the experience of the past China has been that the war with Great Britain in 1842, the war with Britain and France in 1860, and the war with Japan in 1894, each successively resulted in opening the empire far more than before to commerce and modern civilization, as well as to missions. The uprising of 1900, so true, differed from all that had gone before in that it represented a tremendous popular movement in reaction against everything foreign, Christianity included. The fact that, as such, it has totally failed, must be as apparent to the Chinese themselves as it is to all the world; and, notwithstanding the anarchy which still prevails in some districts, there are already signs of beneficial results."

Beecher on the Living Book

No book has had so important and so great a use as the Bible. It has shined in the minds of past generations to guide the ways of men; to make them strong for duty, patient in suffering, upright in life, dignified in death. It is the one book in which righteousness sounds its admonitions from beginning to end: . . . in which fine character is set forth as pure, free from human passion, and centered in love and benevolence. The best thoughts of men are expressed in the Bible, and the best thoughts, best actions, best motives and feelings . . . have been made possible by it. It is a living book, shooting out rays of light and heat into the world.

TRANSIENT TROUBLES

OF every trouble under the sun,
This trouble will be gone,
Long ere the passing year is run,
'Twill be as a tale that is told.
You sit in the shadow and mourn to-day,
But you'll dry your eyes to-morrow;
There's never a trouble that comes to stay,
And there's ever joy after sorrow.

So lift your head, and look up to the sky,
So valiantly take the road,
There's gladness waiting you bye and bye,
Soon you will drop the load.
God sends us our troubles one at a time,
But our joys make haste in troops;
There's a place to rest, if you'll only climb,
And the coward it is that droops.

No matter how dark the present hour,
There's sunlight to follow the rain,
The barest field with bloom will flower,
And the birds come back again.
There's never a trouble that's here to stay,
You'll dry your eyes to-morrow;
You may sit in the shadow and mourn to-day,
But bliss will banish sorrow.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Great Highway

IT was Emerson who said that "traveling is a fool's paradise," but one who reads Mr. Creelman's remarkable book, On the Great Highway, which has just appeared, will be inclined to disagree with the Sage of Concord. The famous war correspondent thrills and surprises his readers with a sense of the bigness of the world and the oneness of the human race. It is a great and moving book, beginning with a benediction by the Pope and ending with the beautiful dying prayer of the late President McKinley. Between these two majestic scenes stretches a brilliant world of adventure—wonderful battles, talks with kings and philosophers, and all the surprising events of a famous journalist's life.

The author takes his readers around the world through courts and camps. There are chapters on "the white shepherd of Rome," the storming of Ping Yang, the King of Corea and his hermit nation, a ride with the Japanese invaders in Manchuria, the battle and massacre of Port Arthur, the author's walks and talks with Count Tolstoi in Russia, the battle of El Caney (in which the author was wounded at the head of the storming column), a thrilling and profoundly religious description of the burials of General Grant and Gladstone, an interview with Louis Kosuth, "the Washington of Hungary," a tear-compelling story of the death of the Czar's English nurse, a talk with Sitting Bull, wonderful scenes on the firing-line in the Philippines, adventures in the Black Republic and newsgathering in a balloon. The closing chapter is a word-picture of the death of "McKinley, the Forgiving." We quote a remarkable passage:

In the afternoon of his last day on earth the President began to realize that his life was slipping away, and that the efforts of science could not save him. He asked Dr. Rixey to bring the surgeons in. One by one the surgeons entered and approached the bedside. When they were gathered about him, the President opened his eyes and said:

"It is useless, gentlemen; I think we ought to have prayer."

The dying man crossed his hands on his breast, and half-closed his eyes. There was a beautiful smile on his countenance. The surgeons bowed their heads. Tears streamed from the eyes of the white-clad nurses on either side of the bed. The yellow radiance of the sun shone softly in the room.

"Our Father, which art in heaven," said the President, in a clear, steady voice.

The lips of the surgeons moved.

"Hallowed be thy name. Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done—"

The sobbing of a nurse disturbed the still air. The President opened his eyes and closed them again.

"Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."

A long sigh. The sands of life were running swiftly. The sunlight died out and raindrops dashed against the windows.

"Give us this day our daily bread; and forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Another silence. The surgeons looked at the dying face and the trembling lips.

"For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

"Amen," whispered the surgeons.

A Siberian City of Churches†

AS the feeble and halting train that brought us from Lake Baikal, following the meanderings of the swift Angara River, drew near to Irkutsk, the capital of Central Siberia, we received the impression of a small city dominated by a score of great churches. And this impression was not dissipated when we crossed the Angara on the bridge of boats that links the city with the railway on the other side and found ourselves within the city precincts.

You cannot look up without seeing a beautiful dome or spire. In the waters of the Angara the great cathedral is reflected, flanked by two other churches which in any other city of its size would be considered marvels. The principal street of the city seems to lead up to and terminate in another lofty and imposing church, while every section of the town has its own ecclesiastical buildings of lesser magnitude. Brooklyn must look out for its laurels as the City of Churches when it comes in competition with Irkutsk.

The interior of the churches is quite equal to their exterior, and they blaze with sacred pictures and icons, framed and matted in gold, so that the chief impression one gets is of walls of solid gold, chased and fretted and highly ornamented, with the face of Christ or the Virgin or some Oriental saint peering out between the shining plates.

The Russians are evidently an extremely devout and religious people. This is evidenced by their churches, which are always, both metaphorically and literally, higher than the chimneys of their factories. In the small towns along the line of the railway the church is always the one conspicuous object. The village may be, it probably is, built entirely of logs, without a single frame or brick house within its border. But the church, with its glittering dome and blue and green towers, always lifts its Greek cross skyward, and reminds the poor Moujiks that there is another world above the flat plains of Siberia.

The unabashed devoutness of the peasants tells the same story as their churches. Our fellow-travelers in the fourth-class cars from Stretinsk never omitted their morning devotions, their ablutions being an entirely secondary matter. The poorest boatman would always cross himself and bless his crust of black bread before he ate it. The soldiers with whom we journeyed for hundreds of versts, undismayed by the presence of their comrades, would every morning face the rising sun, and though they could secure no possible privacy, would, with genuine devoutness, pray for ten minutes at a time, standing bareheaded and reverential in the crowded railway car in which they were traveling. Such genuine devotion speaks well for the church which fosters it, and for the country that is peopled and defended by faithful devotees, for no nation without a religion which took strong hold of the hearts of the common people ever greatly influenced the destinies of the world.

Irkutsk has had time enough to grow, for it was founded thirty years after the Mayflower sailed into Plymouth harbor, and is about ready to celebrate its quarter millennial. Founded originally as a military post to withstand the attacks of wandering Tartars, its naturally advantageous situation has made it the metropolis of Siberia. It is now the seat of government of the province of Eastern Siberia, and contains something over fifty thousand inhabitants. It contains twenty-five Greek churches, substantial Catholic and Lutheran churches, and two synagogues. There are no less than forty schools, among which are seminaries for girls, military and technical schools of various kinds, so that the young idea of Irkutsk has no excuse for not learning how to shoot.

THE INGERSOLL CHURCH

Re-opening of the Building in which the Father of the Famous Agnostic Used to Preach : : : :

SPECIAL interest attaches to a service held recently in the little church, a picture of which is here given. The building has a peculiar fame, in that it was the church in which the father of the late Col. Robert G. Ingersoll used to preach. It stands in the hamlet of Hanover Green, N. Y., near Waterville. For many years it has been unoccupied, and its doors and windows have been boarded up. There are many families in the neighborhood,

INGERSOLL'S FATHER'S CHURCH

but either they have other church connections, or do not attend any church, so the old edifice, in which the notorious agnostic heard his father proclaim the truths which he spent his life in assailing, has not echoed the sound of praise and prayer for a quarter of a century. The long silence has now been broken, for a few weeks ago the building was once more crowded with eager listeners, and from the impregnable Book the Gospel message was declared within its walls.

The incident came about in connection with the work inaugurated by Mr. H. B. Gibbud, of Springfield, Mass., among the hop-pickers. Every season, for ten years past, Mr. Gibbud has arranged for Gospel services among the thousands of men and women who go to the hop gardens of Oneida and Madison Counties in New York State to gather the harvest. The evangelists travel in a wagon through the district, visiting the gardens during the day, distributing tracts and religious literature. In the evening a Gospel service is held in some centrally situated place, sometimes in a farm-house, sometimes in a barn or schoolhouse and occasionally at the crossroads in the open air. Evangelist E. C. Baker was working this season in the district, and noticing the old disused church asked permission to hold a service in it. It was readily granted, and the building was opened and cleaned. Notices were sent out that a Gospel address would be given there on Sunday afternoon. The day turned out wet and the roads were muddy, but that did not deter a large audience from assembling. Two ministers from the neighborhood came to help the evangelist. There was some hearty singing of hymns and an earnest sermon from John 3: 16. After the service there was some social talk among the neighbors, and a desire was expressed to have the historic church opened again. This was no meaningless suggestion, for a hundred dollars was contributed on the spot toward putting it in decent repair. Some of the older persons present described Dr. Ingersoll as an earnest preacher, with great power as a revivalist. All appeared delighted at the prospect of the old church being again opened and promised to support it.

The Barbados Mission

S. Antoinette Esterbrooks, Superintendent of the West India and South American Mission, at Barbados, W. I., is arranging to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the work in that country. In recent years the work has grown so materially that two halls are now rented for the purpose. There are urgent calls to extend the mission's operations to Trinidad. Any one desiring to know further concerning the work may address Mrs. Esterbrooks, at the Mission, Barbados, W. I.

SLAVES OF APPETITE

How the Victim of the Drink Habit May be Delivered

By MRS. M. BAXTER

GOD has made men to be interdependent; seeking not every man his own, but every man another's good (1 Cor. 12:26). If a man in his business seeks to become rich, utterly regardless of how his methods may affect other men, he is sinning against the general good, and sooner or later judgment will overtake him. The whole of the liquor trade, which is so lucrative financially, comes under this category. How will those answer at the great day of account who have become rich and lived lives of ease and luxury by the manufacture or the sale of that which fills our lunatic asylums, jails and workhouses on earth with its miserable victims?

The superintendent of a large lunatic asylum was heard to say recently that out of 2,000 inmates, the insanity of 1,400 was caused by drunkenness! In the statistics of crime, probably the percentage of victims of the drink is not much below these terrible figures; and all who visit poorhouses know how large a proportion of those who are supported by the rates levied on the industrious and sober, have become paupers through the drink. Probably two-thirds of the public money spent on jails, lunatic asylums and poorhouses might be saved if those who are getting rich on the manufacture and sale of liquor were learning, according to the apostle Paul, "to maintain good works [or honest trades] for necessary uses"; not to entice other men to sin. And if the liquor trade thus impoverishes the country and forces those who do work to maintain those who do not, how much more terrible is its result in the unspeakable ruin of immortal souls! "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink" (Hab. 2:15).

But no man is forced to become a drunkard; each man is responsible to God for his own soul. "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink; that tarry late into the night until wine inflame them!" This is not woe to the great brewer, or to the distiller, or the successful saloon-keeper; that is spoken in Hab. 2:15. Here it is, Woe to the drunkard, who lets himself be taken in this snare of the devil. He, as well as those who have made it easy for him to sin, must each one "give account of himself to God" (Rom. 14:12). The drunkard may reproach the liquor manufacturer or seller, but he cannot carry that reproach against his fellow-sinner to the judgment bar of God. He must give account for his own sin; his own misappropriation of his own life. And the manufacturer or seller may easily retort against the reproach of his victims that if they did not patronize him so well he could not make sin so easy for them. But will he in this way meet the solemn charge of a holy God who has been warning him year after year, "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink?"

But why should many a generous-hearted man or woman fall into this terrible snare. We believe many of those who are naturally kind-hearted and generous easily become a prey to the drink, for the very reason given by the prophet (Isa. 5:12): "They regard not the work of the Lord, neither have they considered the operation of his hands." They think they have power over their own will; they do not see that the Lord alone can save them. They do not believe in their need of salvation, and therefore they do not regard the work which the Lord Jesus did for them upon the cross; and they try to keep themselves by good resolutions, when the Lord is our keeper, who can never be taken unawares, for he "shall neither slumber nor sleep."

"Therefore hell hath enlarged herself and opened her mouth without measure, and their glory and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it." What an ending to a misspent life! The only appropriate epitaph for such would be, "Here lies a man who has lost all." But when God renders to every man his desert, and "the mean man shall be brought down, and the mighty man shall be humbled, and the eyes of the lofty shall be humbled," then the Lord of hosts shall be exalted in judgment, and God that is holy shall be sanctified in righteousness. He shall not do wrong; he will be glorified in the salvation of those who receive the Saviour, but he will also be glorified in the judgment of "them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess. 1:8).

God calls us to be the temple of the Holy Ghost, the dwelling-place of God. Our bodies as well as our souls are bought with a price; we are not our own, and we have no right to dispose of ourselves (1 Cor. 6:19, 20). We belong neither to God's enemy nor to ourselves. We are God's property by creation and by redemption. Satan seeks to persuade us that we are our own, and that we have a right to the disposal of all we are and have; and it is only when we are alive to God's rights to us, so that we yield ourselves to him unreservedly that we are free from the oppressor. As soon as our will is one with God's will, and our trust is placed in him, the power of the enemy is broken, and we are free. But our only safety is in continual dependence upon and communion with him.

KEEN COLLEGE MEN.

The Food of Harvard Brain-Workers and Athletes.

Memorial Hall at Harvard, where some twelve hundred of the men eat, is particularly interesting. The dining-room is an enormous gothic hall finished in old English oak, with wide stained-glass windows on the sides. The walls are hung with portraits of illustrious graduates and benefactors of past generations.

The students have good food to eat, and plenty of it. The hall is run on a co-operative plan, so that it costs something less than four dollars a week for board. To this place three times a day come men, whose lives for the time being are given to serious intellectual work, and to accomplish this, they are keen enough to realize that proper food is absolutely necessary.

One is particularly struck by the yellow packages of Grape-Nuts standing on nearly every table, which the men purchase at grocery stores and bring in for their personal use. They quickly find out by practical demonstration that brain work exhausts the phosphates, and that nature demands that this loss be made up, and made up from food.

Grape-Nuts is ready to be used without cooking, it is a scientific food which nourishes and builds up the brain, and is particularly suited to the needs of students.

The Varsity athletes also eat it to keep their digestive organs in perfect working order, so that they can stand the great strain of both body and head-work when important contests shall come.

"LIZA ANN"

An Episode from Real Life Among the Mountaineers

I AM sitting in the firelight. A log of green wood resting among the ashes ladens the air with perfume, and as the flames lick their prey, the sound of boiling sap is heard. I gently rub the wood, and myriads of sparks leap at my touch, reminding me of the remark of Eliphaz: "A man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward."

THE MOURNERS IN THE LOG CABIN

There is a one-roomed log-cabin across the mountain, where for the first evening motherless children mourn. The wind moans around the chimney, the miner's lamp flickers and smokes in the fitful draughts, and poverty and grief go hand in hand in that lonely home across the mountain.

Two days ago, I sat preparing my sermon. It was to be the first sermon of its kind that the poor mountaineers had ever heard, and it must be simply told, in an interesting way. A rap on the door interrupted me, and without waiting for my invitation to enter, the door slowly opened, disclosing a ragged, starved-looking boy of about ten years of age.

"What is it?" I asked, seeing he was too frightened to volunteer any information.

"Please sir, Lizy Ann is a-dyin', an' they say fer yer ter come quick," he answered.

Not many moments passed before I was following the messenger up the steep mountain trail. After an hour's climbing, we turned to the right and entered a log-cabin, standing back among the woods.

As 'Liza Ann and I talked of the home to which she was hastening, the mountaineers who filled the room sobbed aloud. All day I sat at the bedside, and when the pain lessened, 'Liza would smile at me, and glance upward. Evening drew on, and life yet struggled for the mastery. The bare cabin looked more desolate in the shadows. The rough walls partly covered with newspapers, the articles of clothing, oil-can, boots, tobacco and dried herbs that hung from the rafters, the clumsy mantel, all helped to form a picture more barren, seemingly, than in the daylight. The room was lighted only from the fireplace, and the shadows crept up and down the walls, like evil spirits.

As night wore on, the sufferer whispered to us, asking us to sing. We gathered close about her and sang her favorites. Tears rolled down the rough faces of the mountaineers; toil-worn hands sought each other, as the music floated out on the night.

Abide with me, fast falls the eventide,
The darkness deepens, Lord with me abide.

But darkness was not deepening for 'Liza Ann. Day, eternal day, CONTINUED was dawning, and as, with ON PAGE 970

CLERGYMAN'S CHILDREN.

Coffee Being Replaced by Postum Food Coffee.

"I am the wife of a minister. About three years ago a warm friend, an exemplary mother and the conscientious wife of a minister, asked me if I had ever tried giving up coffee and using the Postum Food Coffee. I had been telling her of my excessive nervousness and ill health. She said: 'We drink nothing else for breakfast but Postum Food Coffee, and it is a delight and a comfort to have something that we do not have to refuse the children when they ask for it.'

I was surprised that she would permit the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she explained that it was a most healthful beverage and that the children thrived on it. A very little thought convinced me that for brainwork, one should not rely upon a stimulant such as coffee is, but should have food and the very best of food.

My first trial of Postum was a failure. The maid of all work brought it to the table, lukewarm, weak, and altogether lacking in character. We were in despair, but decided on one more trial. At the second trial, we faithfully followed the directions, used four teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let it boil full fifteen minutes after the real boiling began, and served it with rich cream. It was delicious and we were all won.

"I have since sung the praises of Postum Food Coffee on many, many occasions and induced numbers of friends to abandon coffee and use Postum, with remarkable results. The wife of a college professor said to me a short time ago that nothing had ever produced so marked a change in her husband's health as the leaving off of coffee and the use of Postum Food Coffee." Cod Liver Oil is a food and the greatest care should be exercised in its selection.

Peter Moller's Cod Liver Oil is the best oil that over fifty years of continued scientific research has produced. By the process employed the oil is kept from contact with the atmosphere from the beginning of the process of manufacture until it is safely corked up in bottles, thus preventing contamination of any kind and excluding all impurities.

Ask for Peter Moller's Oil, and see that the bottle—a flat, oval one—bears our name as agents. Notice the date in perforated letters at bottom of the label.
